TRADICIÓN

You wouldn't rollerblade through the Guggenheim. You wouldn't slap sashimi in a sesame bun. So don't shoot back Sauza® Tres Generaciones® Tequilas. Please.

You see, we've gone to a lot of trouble to ensure these are some of the finest and smoothest tequilas you can buy. Añejo, Reposado and Plata each represent the culmination of generations of distilling expertise and tradition. They're all made from 100% estate grown blue agave - some of which have taken 12 years to ripen even before they reach La Perseverancia, the distillery founded by Don Cenobio Sauza in 1873.

We know Sauza® Tres Generaciones® can be a mouthful (that's why Tequila aficionados simply refer to it as "3Gs"), but please, take the time to appreciate it; don't shoot down the whole mouthful in one. Smell it. Sip it. Savor it. Share it with your friends. After all, it's taken us 132 years to get it this good, so don't you think you could find a few more moments to appreciate it?

OUT OF THE CITY

Most of our readers live, work and play in the city, so we keep a pretty tight focus on Boston proper in our coverage. But that doesn't mean there aren't great discoveries to be made in the city's farther-flung suburbs. In this issue's main feature, we zero in on five towns with bars, restaurants, boutiques and spas worth exploring. A little trip to Hingham or Newburyport, with faces and places that are new to you, might be just what you need as a post-holiday pick-me-up. Our guide tells you the best places to go.

Helping you make the most of the fun stuff around you remains our big mission as we head into our 15th year. Here's to a 2006 filled with exciting new experiences.

SHE'S NO OKIE

Sarah Borges, who was featured on your "It List" cover (Dec. 7), was born and raised in Taunton, Mass., not Oklahoma! We're proud of our hometown girl. Next time, have your writers do a little research before publishing that kind of information.

—ADELINA ROMERO

SCAM A LOT

Ezra's so right about those annoying scammers (Oct. 26). There are some near North Station and on Cambridge Street that ask for a dollar for a bus ticket, because they've lost their wallet. Sometimes they're a couple, and both claim to have lost their wallets! If I were to lose my wallet, I'd call someone I knew collect.

—CINTA BURGOS

AT LEAST WE GOT OUR NAME RIGHT

Your name couldn't be more correct. Your recent write-up about Living Colour's show at the Paradise (Dec. 7) was full of improper facts. To say they haven't played together for 10 years is incorrect. In fact, they played Oct. 17, 2004, with Public Enemy at Avalon, and before that at the Paradise Rock Club on Nov. 11, 2003. Also, their last album was released in 2003, so to say that it's new is a stretch. Next time around, do the research.

NEW IN TOWN

Toro, Toro, Toro

After a few false starts, chef Ken Oringer's tapas restaurant Toro, which attained superstar status the moment it was announced, has at last opened in the South End. For the seven of you who don't know, Oringer's the much-lauded mastermind behind tony sushi spot Uni and ultra–high end New American restaurant Clio. Toro, however, is super casual. On the first night of business, it was already filled with genuflecting patrons checking out the menu, which was written in Spanish on a giant chalk board behind the bar. A T-shirt–clad Oringer was behind the bar and in the kitchen doling out the small plates, which range from simple pan con tomate (toasted bread rubbed with tomato, garlic and Spanish olive oil, sprinkled with sea salt, $3) to fancier fare like mejillas de ternera con rioja (braised veal cheeks with Rioja, prunes and onions ($12).

Waitstaff, many of whom were chatting in Spanish, zipped from the open kitchen and the bar to the tables, bringing steaming plates filled with ceviche de bacalao (traditional salt cod fritters with lemon rings) and salteado de setas con huevo (wild mushrooms sautéed with olive oil, garlic and farm egg) as each was ready.

Toro's décor—exposed brick, wine bottles along the walls, rustic tables, soft lighting, a small fireplace and bunches of red flowers—is the only thing that's subdued about the place. Lively world music booms, and the food is Oringer-esque, bursting with flavor.

Those who don't like to nosh so much as dine can choose from bigger dishes like the classic paella valenciana ($32), which serves two to four people, or a suckling pig with Pedro Ximinez glaze for two ($30). But the smaller tapas take up most of the menu, many are quite cheap ($3-$6), and the Spanish flavors go perfectly with the house sangria. Oringer even put a Spanish twist on the ubiquitous mini burger: His kobe beef burger comes with smoked tomato, allioli and pickled red onion ($12). Order a few of the small plates to make a meal but save room for churros con chocolate. 1704 Washington St., Boston (617-536-4300).

Santas' Secrets

We kicked it with some real-life Santas from South Shore Plaza and the Northshore, Square One and Natick Malls and got the 411 on what kids are asking for this year, how to deal with a crying baby and the power of the Santa beard.

Improper Bostonian: What are kids asking for this year?

NS Santa: Little girls still love Barbies, and the older kids are all over the iPods, Xboxes and other video games.

SO Santa: Dora the Explorer is out-doing Barbie 5-to-1 for little girls this year, and the boys are still asking for video games and action figures, like Spiderman and Batman.

IB: How many of the kids are terrified of you?

N Santa: We get a good share of criers, but sometimes we use the drop-and-run method: A parent drops a kid on my lap, we shoot the picture, and before the kid knows where he is, the parent runs over and scoops him up.

SS Santa: We get a lot of crying babies, but with the real young ones, crying sometimes looks like laughing, so the pictures come out great.

IB: Most memorable Santa moment?

SO Santa: This season I've had both a 6-day-old girl and a 91-year-old woman sit on my lap.

SS Santa: One boy was insistent on getting a horse for Christmas, and I knew it wasn't going to happen, so I told him the North Pole was too cold for animals. He understood.

IB: What happens when kids ask: Are you the real Santa?

NS Santa: I always try to convince them. I have a piece of coal in my pocket to threaten them with just in case.

SO Santa: I have them tug the beard and they believe.

N Santa: I've done a lot of toy research and have great stories about my reindeer and elves.

SS Santa: The kids have no doubts. They pull my beard and are convinced I'm the real Santa, because I am.

TASTY TIDBITS

Below Dedo

Dedo Lounge and Bistro just opened below Dedo.

The Down Low at Dedo... Boston's Bay Village got a little pick-me-up last month when the space below the bar Dedo opened as the (separately owned but similarly named) Dedo Lounge and Bistro. Co-owners and former Dedo patrons Greg Guarente and Zane Bower saw great potential in the empty space below the bar, and offer home-style Italian-American fare both at the bar area and at a smattering of tables. Popular among chef Nicholas Chauarria's simple creations are steak frites, homemade pastas and fresh fish. 69 Church St., Boston (617-338-9999).

Get Lost... Cambridge's Rustic Kitchen is spicing up Wednesday nights with a tribute to one of hottest shows on TV. Each week, the Kitchen shows ABC's Lost on the flat-screen TV above the restaurant's bar from 9-10 pm, and during the show offers half-priced appetizers, homemade brick-oven pizzas for $6 and beers for four bucks a pop. Sounds like a pretty good deal to us...and so does getting stranded on an island with Evangeline Lilly. 1815 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-354-7766). www.rustickitchen.biz.

Wadda Sauce... What's in your favorite jar of BBQ sauce? Chances are the good stuff is laced with preservatives and packed with sugar. BBQ lovers Andrew Bausman of Arlington and Bill Downing of Reading are changing all that with Willy's Wadda, a line of all-natural, preservative-, cholesterol- and dairy-free sauces. Mexican Fajita, Jamaican Jerk, Carolina BBQ and Waikiki BBQ are now sold in gourmet shops and health food stores around the city and suburbs. Or you can order the sauces direct from the company's Web site, which includes cooking tips and recipe ideas. The sauces are packaged by Vermont Pepper Works, using only high-quality, fresh ingredients. Jars go for about $3 plus shipping. Willy's Foods (800-824-9010). www.willysfoods.com.

Branching Out... Restaurateurs Brad Dalbeck and Chris Damian, the team behind Scollay Square in Beacon Hill, finalized plans in early November to purchase Tavern on the Water in Charlestown. They intend to redesign the 325-seat spot, and Damian, who's been the chef at Border Café, Scollay Square and the Jumbalaya in Danvers, has unveiled a new menu focusing on comfort foods. 1 Pier 6, 8th St., Charlestown Navy Yard, Charlestown (617-242-8040). www.tavernonthewater.com.

SAM SAYS

Mac Daddy

If you haven't heard of MAC Cosmetics by now, you might want to come out from under that rock: Known for its celebrity following, MAC is the crème de la crème of the cosmetics industry. MAC has everything you didn't even know you wanted (until you saw it), offering an endless array of makeup colors. Though you've always been able to find some MAC products in department stores, the new 1,400 square-foot boutique on Newbury Street is a Boston first. Now you've got access to the whole collection, like Chromacake foundation, Paintsticks creamy face colors and mixing mediums that turn powders into creams. As always, you're in good hands with their knowledgeable staff and talented makeup artists. The store opens at the end of December. 112 Newbury St., Boston (800-387-6707). —Samantha House

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTIO

Making Tammy Faye Proud... LuxLash, the country's first spa to focus strictly on lashes and brows, is here to thicken, lengthen, shape or strengthen those facial features they say can make or break a pretty face. Brow and Lash extensions are their specialty: For $250, you get extra-long lashes that last about two months, and for an extra cost your lashes can be decorated in materials like faux fur, feathers and crystal appliqués. (Soon to come are diamond-encrusted lashes.) Brow services ($50-$150) aim to correct over-plucking or waxing mishaps. Eye-brightening services ($50) for both men and women include a facial massage and product application meant to tighten the skin, reduce puffiness and brighten the eye area. If you really dig your mascara-free look, you can join a maintenance club, which gets you a free visit for every six appointments. 231 Newbury St., Boston (617-587-5274). www.luxlash.com.

Squeaky Clean... With all the chemicals in what we eat, drink and breathe, maintaining a toxin-free lifestyle is practically impossible. That's why health guru Dr. Douglas Wine just opened up D Tox Boston, a service meant to draw toxins from your body—through your feet. By soaking your tootsies in a tub of ionized water for 23 minutes, Wine says, positive and negative ions are absorbed through the pores in your feet, jump-starting the body's natural detoxification process. The results? Painless toxin removal and a tub of grossly discolored water. Wine, a chiropractor, claims that the process increases energy; promotes weight loss and glowing skin; and alleviates allergies, migraines, fatigue, arthritis and memory loss. One visit costs $55, but Wine recommends multiple visits to more thoroughly detoxify. $500 gets you 10 visits. 83 Newbury St., Boston (617-867-0007). www.bostondtox.com.

D Tox Boston

Be Jeweled... Maine native and Portland School of Art grad Laura Preshong recently christened her South End store, Laura Preshong Jewelry. The small, ultra-modern space is filled with wearable and visual art by about 15 artists (prices range from $35-$2,100). Preshong's goal is to display both jewelry and artwork of different artists each month, creating an art gallery/jewelry store. Tue.-Wed., 11 am-6 pm; Thu.-Sat., 11am-7pm; Sun., 12-5 pm. 53 Dartmouth St., Boston (617-236-7660).

Solid Gold... You grew up with dreams of someday taking home a Grammy, but with age came a harsh realization: You have no talent. Don't let that stop you from taking home the gold record. Boston musician (as well as Bruins, Celtics and Red Sox team photographer) Brian Babineau's new business, Custom Record Awards, creates gold and platinum records just like the rock stars get. You choose the artwork and pick the name that gets emblazoned across the plaque, and after shelling out the $125 (gold) or $135 (platinum), you've just bought your way to fame in a frame. www.customrecordawards.com.

FLIGHT CLUB

You may redeem your frequent flyer miles for a one-way trip to Screw Youville.

There are some companies that I just feel bad for. Like Hanes. Am I supposed to be impressed by the dregs that Hanes got its Hanes on? Damon Wayons—no way! Marissa Tomei? Awesome! How did they get such a big-time actress to be in a commercial? I think that if you're in a "Look who we got our Hanes on" ad, you're probably hard-up enough that they pay you in tighty-whities. And poor Hanes is so proud of itself, like a 5 year old with a booger on his finger.

I also pity Blockbuster, with its desperate no-late-fee policy, or, as I like to call it, "the forever rental." And LL Bean, which honors its lifetime guarantee even when it really shouldn't. I once returned a year-old pair of underwear with a big hole in the crotch and got my money back. The incredulous woman at the counter said, "Are you really unsatisfied with these?" and I said, "You'd better gimme my money before I have to get LL Mean." No, I didn't. She just gave me my refund, because LL Bean is nice like that.

Yes, when it comes to consumerism, I play hardball. I am king and always right, and my business had better be appreciated. Which brings me to my current problem, which is that I tend to harbor grudges, and I'm blacklisting travel-related companies so quickly that soon I won't be able to leave my house because I hate everyone so much. First, it was Orbitz. They were bastards about changing a reservation, and now I can never use Orbitz again. Then it was a local cab company that left me standing on the curb for a half-hour before admitting that they wouldn't be able to get a car over to Southie until roughly August of 2008. But I'm going to have a bigger problem with my new boycott of a certain giant airline. I don't even want to tell you which airline it was, but I imagine that when Sir Elton John last hung out with Sir Paul McCartney, he might've asked, "So, when were you knighted?"

Here are the events that led to my current vendetta: I was on my way to Japan, and I should've been worried as soon as I changed planes in Chicago, because the 747 that awaited at O'Hare was so crappy that Xzibit was standing on the runway making fun of it. We sat on the runway for two hours while they tried to get the onboard video system functioning. Eventually they gave up, concluding that it would be better to get moving than cancel the flight due to a malfunctioning DVD of Shrek 2.

It got worse. Specifically, about three hours into the flight, somewhere near the edge of the Arctic Ocean, when the pilo announced, "You'll notice that the sun i now on the other side of the plane. That' bad. That means we've turned around." Ap parently, we'd bonked the tail of the plan on the runway on takeoff, and we had to re turn to Chicago to check it out. We'd onl flown as far as we had to burn fuel to lighte the plane enough to land without drivin the struts up through the fuselage. The flight ended up being rescheduled to the next day, which effectively rendered my two-day trip pointless, so I returned to Boston having spent my day flying to the Arctic Ocean for absolutely no reason.

A few weeks later, I checked my frequent-flyer account, expecting that the six-hour joyride would at least be credited. Fat chance, so it was time for Take-No-Bullcrap Man to spring to action with some righteous outrage. I wrote an e-mail to the customer service department saying that if this matter isn't rectified to my satisfaction, I'd sell all my frequent-flyer miles and do everything in my power to avoid that airline in the future. I sat back and waited for the groveling apology I was certain would be forthcoming.

About a month later, I received an e-mail telling me that I can stick my beverage cart where the seats don't recline, because you don't get miles unless "a ticket is purchased and a flight flown." So if a ticket is purchased and you fly in circles for six hours because the pilot thought he was in the space shuttle instead of a Boeing, thus botching your entire trip, that doesn't count. Sorry, you're out of luck. In fact, you're lucky that once they decided to turn around, the flight attendant didn't stick her finger down your throat to get back that lunch they'd just wasted on your refund-demanding ass.

It's all too much, this horrible reminder of how unimportant I am. I'm going to go buy some Hanes. Me and Hanes, we're about right for each other. IB

THE DANCE

BY JOHN D. SPOONER

I've Got a Little List

It's time to reflect on the year that was, before ringing in the year to come.

Americans love lists and "top tens," especially in these days of information overload (or misinformation, as I like to call it). This is not really a column of lists, but random thoughts on goodies from the closing year—things that have appealed to me, and perhaps might interest you.

The writer John Fowles died this fall. I think that in the 1960s and '70s, there was no better writer in the English language. I believe in the importance of romance, no matter what your age, and before I was married, I thought Fowles' novel The Magus set the standard for the strange mystery of love in all of its magic and complexities.

Early in our marriage I mentioned several books I thought my wife would enjoy, including The Magus. "Ahhh," she said, "the improving-my-mind department? Forget it." That was the end of that until one wintry Sunday, when I saw her curled up on the couch reading the book. Hours later she was still at it, and on into the night, totally absorbed. Finally, as she was still reading in bed after midnight, I said, "Okay, it's time to shut the lights." This led to an argument, then to something else. Our son Nicholas was born almost nine months later, named after Nicholas Urfe, the hero of Fowles' novel.

Little, Brown was Fowles' American publisher. They were also mine, and from them I got Fowles' address. I wrote him, telling him the story of our Nicholas and his conception (well, most of it). Months later I received a note from Fowles postmarked from Greece, where they were shooting the film version of The Magus. "Loved the story," he wrote. "I had very many pregnant meanings in the novel. But nothing that pregnant." Still more amazing is that the novel's heroine is named Alison, the same as Nick Spooner's new bride. Want to get lucky? You read it, too.

Other book ideas for year-end: Thrillers and mysteries would include any of the psychological works of the brilliant Ruth Rendell, especially The Bridesmaid and The Rottweiler; any novel of Colin Harrison, but particularly Afterburn (order from Amazon; it's a few years old); and the wonderful African thrillers of Robert Wilson.

Here's a fragment of a list from one of my favorite characters, who writes privately for his friends under the pseudonym Bill Diamond. In real life he is one of Boston's best lawyers, practical and wise. He has a rolling list titled "Stop Living Like a Stupid Person: 200 or so Common Mistakes Even You Can Avoid." They include:

- Don't move to Buffalo for a better job.
- Don't go up on your roof to check on the problem first.
- Don't ask your father about his sex life.
- Don't cancel your poker game to spend more time with the family.
- Don't ask your single friends what they did over the weekend.
- Don't admit to the kids that you smoked dope in college.

I think that this is the kind of lawyer to retain for your own use: someone quirky who thinks about the things real people consider, when they are honest with themselves.

Only two movie thoughts to pass on, one old flick, one new one. Rent The Professionals, a film somewhat like The Dirty Dozen, with an all-star cast led by Burt Lancaster. Lee Marvin has a classic line in it, one I'm often tempted to use at inappropriate times: "What else is on your mind besides 100-proof women, 90-proof whiskey and 14-carat gold?"

My favorite movie in 2005 was not very popular but, in my opinion, fascinating on a number of levels. It's Lord of War with Nicolas Cage, all about international arms dealing and dealers: not nice people doing not nice things. This is not only for the guys. My wife loved it as much as I did, although her year's favorite was Pride and Prejudice. (Every time this is remade, however, whether on TV or in the movies, it's always her favorite.)

Musical notes include the annual not-to-be-missed Oedipus orgy on WBCN. The legendary program director for at least 20 years has deejayed his Christmas Eve compilation of the history of Christmas music from classical to rock.

And a real failing of mine: lack of true appreciation for jazz. For instance, I never knew until recently that the horn genius Chet Baker also sang. Again, if you love romance, you have to hear Baker singing ballads such as "I'm Old Fashioned," "Let's Get Lost" and "It Could Happen To You." Many good things we wish would happen to us. May they come true.

Happy New Year. IB

I Want My NFL

The leagues's great, but I could make it better.

The NFL is the undisputed new American pastime, but as successful as it's become, the league won't be perfect until these rule changes take effect:

Overtime: I'm not a huge college football fan; in fact, I'd rather watch The Program for the 5,000th time than sit through your average NCAA game. However, anytime a college game goes into OT, I'm watching. The NFL needs to finally adopt the college overtime system and forget about sudden death. Imagine if Major League Baseball created a rule where, once a game hits extra innings, the first run scored—regardless of whether it's in the top or bottom of an inning—would end the game. Actually, scratch that (I don't want to plant any more idiot seeds in Bud Selig's head), but honestly, how ridiculous would that be? Well, that's what the NFL is right now. After 60 minutes of football, how can the league let one little coin toss have so much influence on the outcome of a game? It's one of the purest tenets of competition: Both teams deserve an equal shot, and that's it.

First Downs: This one actually comes courtesy of my friend B, who started his pro–first down campaign a couple of years ago, but I quickly called shotgun on the first down bandwagon. First downs should be a major NFL statistic. What's more important to a team's success over the course of a game: a 12-yard grab on third and 15, or a four-yard slant on third and three? Obviously it's the latter, so why doesn't the NFL distinguish between the two in its box scores, and why can't I find this year's first down leaders anywhere on ESPN or NFL.com? I don't know, but it has to change. Did you know that last season David Givens had 24 consecutive receptions that were good for a first down? Remarkable, but for the most part it went unnoticed. That's a travesty.

Point Spreads: There are 100 factors that played into the NFL's recent rise to supremacy, but only one that matters: gambling. Midweek injury reports? They're for gamblers. The NFL Sunday Ticket? It's for gamblers. Jake Plummer's moustache? That's right, it's for gamblers. It all is. So why must the NFL continue to look the other way during live game telecasts? When the Saints scored 10 fourth-quarter points last month against the Patriots, making the final score 24-17 (the Pats were 10-point favorites), the announcers should have noted it; it would have made an otherwise boring game more interesting. Just once, I'd like to watch a game on ESPN and, after a "meaningless" late-game touchdown, hear Joe Theismann bang his head against the wall and yell, "Shit! There goes my parlay!" Everyone watching the game is thinking it, so why don't they just say it?

Tight Ends: Just change the name of the position, so that no self-respecting man will ever again have to e-mail a fantasy buddy in regard to their search for a "stud tight end."

Challenges: Right now, each team gets two challenges a game, regardless of whether they win or lose them. I say, as long as you don't lose a challenge, there should be an unlimited supply. Right now a team can survive the referees making two bad calls. Why should they have to swallow it if the refs make a third? I'll never understand this.

Basketball Converts: Randy Moss will finish his career as one of the greatest receivers in NFL history, and it has little to do with superior route running, ultra-soft hands or dazzling foot speed. Simply put: Moss is a 6'4" freak of nature with a sick vertical, being chased around by 6-foot-nothing cornerbacks. Are you telling me that LeBron James couldn't have become the best wide receiver in NFL history? But forget about LeBron, there's more than a handful of middle-of-the-road NBA guys, like Stromile Swift, Kwame Brown and Corey Maggette, who would be absolute stars in the NFL. Can you imagine how deadly an athletic 6'10" wide receiver would be? Even if he were just used in goal line situations, he'd be a Pro Bowler. Just look at Antonio Gates. Seriously, let's get this trend going and maybe we can convince Mark Blount to quit hoops and become a tackling dummy for the Pats.

> MAYBE WE CAN CONVINCE MARK BLOUNT TO QUIT HOOPS AND BECOME A TACKLING DUMMY FOR THE PATS

Throwback Jerseys: My John Madden season on Xbox shouldn't be the only time I get to see New England rock their Pat Patriot duds. I'm only asking for one or two games a year. Bring back the old-school unis!

You've heard the call, Paul Tagliabue. Now let's make it happen iB

JOHN KRASINSKI

INTERVIEW BY JONATHAN SOROFF PHOTOGRAPH BY GREG HENRY/LAMOINE PHOTO GROUP

Having sprung to fame playing the nerdy sales rep Jim Halpert on the NBC comedy The Office, John Krasinski, 26, was born and raised in Newton and graduated from Newton South High School. After earning a degree in playwriting, with honors, from Brown, he studied at the National Theater Institute. His television credits include appearances on Law & Order: Criminal Intent, Ed and Without a Trace, while his feature film experiences include Kinsey, Duane Hopwood and the recent Jake Gyllenhaal film, Jarhead, as well as the upcoming Christopher Guest movie For Your Consideration. He divides his time between New York City and Los Angeles.

Jonathan Soroff: Krasinski must be a stage name, right?

John Krasinski: It is. My name was originally John Collins, but I just didn't think it had the flair I needed. I found out the poet laureate of Poland was named Krasinski and so it seemed like a shoe-in for show business.

JS: Good thinking. Let's play TV trivia: Sanford and Son, All in the Family, Queer as Folk and The Office. What do they all have in common?

JK: They were all adapted from English shows.

JS: Very good. But most shows taken from England are bombs. Look at that show Coupling. It was a total dog.

JK: Yeah, or that British show…what was it called? Soprani? It was about a family of soccer hooligans in a bar, and they tried to bring it over here as The Sopranos….Oh, wait. That did OK. Actually the producers of our show are the same ones who brought over Coupling.

JS: So you can't say anything bad about it.

JK: No, but what I can say is that the British version of The Office is literally a perfect show, and everybody in our cast thinks that.

JS: Your show is sort of painful to witness. It's like watching a train wreck. Aren't you just squirming in most of those scenes?

JK: Yes. Especially the long pauses where I'm wondering why Steve [Carell] just said what he did. The good news is that we understand the realism of it. There are painful situations in 9-to-5 life, and we give you the ability to laugh at it, since most people sure as hell can't do it at work.

JS: Have you ever had a 9-to-5 job?

JK: I did a lot of internships. I interned at Hill, Holliday, which was a blast. It was a trip, working on stuff like the Dunkin' Donuts commercials, which still stand as some of the funniest I've ever seen. And then I worked for Conan O'Brien. I was his script intern.

JS: Another Boston homey. Speaking of which, what's up with the fact that everyone on The Office is from Boston?

JK: Boston is actually the capital of the world. You didn't know that? We breed smart-ass, quippy, funny people. Not that I'm one of them. I just sorta sneaked in under the radar.

JS: One thing you'd like to hear about yourself around an office water cooler?

JK: I guess I'd love to hear that this is the cutting edge of comedy right now. We tip our hats to shows like Arrested Development and Curb Your Enthusiasm, and to be mentioned in the same breath as them is really flattering.

JS: You and B.J. Novak, who plays Ryan the temp and writes for the show, graduated from high school together. Who was the class clown?

JK: Interesting. Well, he was kind of a genius and he wrote the first thing I was ever in, which was a parody of the school, so I guess he'd be the class clown.

JS: So are you two like a comedic Matt and Ben?

JK: Oh, yeah. In fact, we were really bummed out that they stole the math genius idea, because we had some really good stuff goin' with that. Ours involved a couple of gifted monkeys, which was actually a really nice twist, so at least they didn't bite that off of us.

JS: You just made Jarhead with Jake Gyllenhaal. Ever wish you'd starred in Brokeback Mountain with him?

JK: Are you kidding? To ride horses through the West with Jake…

JS: …and to sodomize him in a tent?

JK: Oh, wait a minute. That was all backstory. You think Ang Lee got the close-up?

JS: Yup. Of him and Heath Ledger. So there were no sodomy jokes on the Jarhead set?

JK: No. I think I was too scared of getting beaten up. He was so jacked for that movie. I was like, "Wait! What happened to Donnie Darko Jake? I could take that guy." Not so much the jacked-up Jake Gyllenhaal in Jarhead. Oh, that was a good tongue-twister.

JS: What was your first job ever?

JK: Raking leaves for a woman named Mrs. Gorin.

JS: That sounds dirty.

JK: No, no, no. When I shoveled her walkway—that sounds dirty.

JS: Hope you got a raise for that. You went to an Ivy League school and now you pretend to be an entry-level schmendrick. Is your father the doctor proud?

JK: My dad is psyched. He has patients coming in and telling him about their favorite scenes, and he's having a great time with the whole thing. My dad actually said he'd never been more proud of me than when I decided to [become an actor]. So there's the tear-jerker part of your interview.

JS: That's how my dad felt when I told him I was a piano player in a whorehouse. Anyway, who's a better talk show host: Conan O'Brien or Tony Danza?

JK: Ouch. You're putting me on the spot because I just did both shows.

JS: I know.

JK: I guess I'll have to say Conan for no other reason than that I have to go with family. He was the inspiration of all comedy for me. I watched him every night. Then, when I interned for him, it probably reached stalker status, because I was this huge fan getting closer and closer to him. And being in his guest chair was quite honestly the best perk of this whole thing, besides acting on an incredibly cool show…of course, second only to being interviewed by THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN.

JS: Ass-kisser. So your character is in unrequited love. Ever try to win someone over from a significant other?

JK: I'm trying to right now. I'm smitten with a girl from college who has consistently been dating someone when I have been single and vice versa.

JS: There's another tear-jerking moment. I think our readers will be weeping reading this.

JK: Well, I hope they bombard you with phone numbers. This is basically just a one-page dating ad.

JS: OK, give me your personal: Single White Actor Seeks Woman with No Teeth and Webbed Feet?

JK: Umm, no. That's a little over the top. How about Single White Male seeks intelligent, fun-loving woman with a sense of humor who also works as a carny.

JS: There's nothing sexier than a woman from the midway. Now I'm going to be your mother for a minute. You're workin' that shaggy dog look pretty hard. When are you going to get a haircut?

JK: I actually did. It's not shorter, but it is less wing-y.

JS: Good, because that's what I objected to—the Farrah Fawcett Majors-ness of it all. So what do you consider your best feature?

JK: The fuzzy ties I wear on the show.

JS: That's sort of sad.

JK: OK, in total seriousness, I'd say my spontaneity.

JS: One thing you'd have plastic surgery on if you could?

JK: My fuzzy ties.

JS: OK, time for the annoying job interview question: In 10 years, where do you see yourself?

JK: I want to be at the Huntington Theatre Company, playing Sandy the dog in a revival of Annie.

JS: I'll look forward to it. Who would you want to play you in the movie of your life?

JK: Haley Joel Osment. I think if he gets into an awkward teenage phase, he'd be perfect.

JS: Last question: If this were a job interview, tell me one reason why I should hire you.

JK: Because I make a mean cup o' coffee.

"BOSTON IS ACTUALLY THE CAPITAL OF THE WORLD. DIDN'T YOU KNOW THAT? WE BREED SMART-ASS, QUIPPY, FUNNY PEOPLE."

adventures in SUBURBIA

There's more to Boston's suburbs than McMansions and cookie-cutter coffee chains. Venture forth — you'll be pleasantly surprised.

BY WHITNEY ALLEN AND TRACY MAYOR

PHOTOGRAPHS BY BOB PERACHIO

The suburbs: Statistically, there's a good chance you grew up there. Culturally, there's a good chance you moved away as soon as you could. Demographically, there's a good chance you'll someday return, like a wild salmon back from the ocean, to spawn there.

In the meantime, it's likely the suburbs don't rank high on your list of fun places to eat, drink, shop or get groomed, right?

Think again, urbanites. It's true, some of the outlying towns that ring the Boston–Cambridge–Somerville–Brookline core you call home are little more than vast wastelands of Staples, Targets and Home Depots. But others are more interesting than you may have imagined.

We pounded the Greater Boston 'burbs to dig up a quintet of friendly, walkable little urban centers with tons of cheap (even free!) parking, unique shopping, and an outside chance at a Saturday night dinner reservation. Best of all, these are suburbs done up New England–style, which means that in between your finding and feasting, you can soak up the ambience of cottage-lined main streets, white-steepled churches, historic village greens and other charming visions the rest of the country sees only in movies.

Break away from your same old same old for an evening, a day or even a weekend of suburban exploration. Who knows, you may even catch the fish of your dreams.

Above: 1. the casually elegant dining room at the Alchemy Café; 2. Alchemy's steamed littleneck clams, sautéed with onion-dried tomatoes, chorizo, fennel and cilantro in natural broth; 3. the Common Crow market sells health and beauty products and wholesome foods; 4. lunchtime at the Franklin Café.

GLOUCESTER

Equally gorgeous and gritty, this working-class city, which bills itself as America's oldest fishing port, is home to generations of fishermen and artists. And Gloucester shows off both influences with frankness and flair.

It's a 10-minute hike from the commuter rail stop to Gloucester's oft-painted harbor and Stacy Boulevard, where the locals walk, stroll, run and 'blade past the famous Fisherman's Memorial Statue (landlubbers might know him best as the dude from the fish sticks box). Further out is Rocky Neck, a narrow spit of land laden with layers of tiny art galleries crammed cheek-by-jowl with some serious summertime drinking spots.

But the easiest way to get a good feel for the authentic mix of the artistic, the up-and-coming and the lost past is to wander the mile or so of Main Street, one block up from the harbor, where long-closed department stores and granite-fronted banks share space with funky used clothing and music stores, eclectic art galleries and high-end restaurants, with the occasional genuine Italian deli or coffee bar thrown in for good measure. While you're there, take a detour over to the Cape Ann Historical Museum, a beautifully renovated little space that houses an impressive collection of works by local boy Fitz Hugh Lane, alongside various maritime and decorative-arts bits and pieces.

Where to Eat and Drink

Steer clear of the seafood mega-joints that cater to busloads of whale watchers, and for God's sake, stay out of the fishermen's bars. (If you ask a local where to find "that bar from The Perfect Storm," you deserve whatever happens to you next.) Instead, make yourself happy by heading to The Franklin Café Cape Ann, the northern outpost of the famous South End eatery. The space is warm, dark and cozy, the food is fantastic (pan-seared Atlantic cod with chorizo hash is one local favorite off the winter menu) and the place stays open late into the night, thanks to a roomy upstairs bar. A few doors up, Passports picks up the Franklin's overflow, though it's a destination restaurant in its own right. Newcomer Alchemy Café & Bistro also is worth checking out; it has an enormous and eclectic menu and a great bar area laid out around an open wood fire. For java and WiFi, check out the Lone Gull Coffeehouse.

Where to Shop

Ula Blue boldly goes where few suburban boutiques dare, carrying such city-sophisticate clothing lines as Citizens of Humanity, Trina Turk, BCBG Max Azria, LA Made and Joe's Jeans. Tiny Field & Brown offers a cute collection of housewares, while the dark and creaky-floored Bookends will bring back memories of newsstands past. Local Colors Gallery offers jewelry, pottery, clothing and accessories, as well as affordable oils, watercolors and pastels, all produced by local female artists. Bananas is good for used clothing, for both men and women, as well as any Marilyn Monroe or Elvis tchotchke you might be missing. Stick your head into Virgilio's Bakery & Deli for a whiff of Italy as authentic as anything you'd find in the North End (or Sicily, for that matter), and finally, way down the street, check out Mystery Train, which sells used records, tapes and CDs to those still willing to pay for their tunes.

Where to Get Gorgeous

Though there are a couple of bona fide salons-cum-day spas in the area, like Adesso Hair and Day Spa, Tridosha Salon and Spa or the Deborah Coull Salon, Gloucester women tend to focus more on inner beauty. To that end, check out Common Crow Natural Market (just off Main Street), which sells chemical-free makeup and several lines of high-end holistic skin care products in addition to a wide repertoire of tinctures, teas, supplements, spices and groceries.

HINGHAM

Outdoor types in the know go to Hingham to get back to nature, but leave some time afterward to stay for its small-town charms. A quick drive south from Boston or ferry trip from Rowes Wharf will put you in Hingham, land of hiking, biking, horseback riding and cross-country skiing, to say nothing of the gorgeous coastal views. And if you can't manage to get going before the daylight fades, you can still go cross-country skiing at night.

Of the half dozen or so Hingham parks to choose from, two stand out. You can have your pick of four miles of walking paths and gaze fondly back at the Boston skyline at World's End, or explore the 10 miles of hiking trails at Wompatuck State Park.

Then, after your exertions at the nature preserve of your choice, take in the historic downtown, otherwise known as Hingham Square. You can't miss it—just follow Main Street to where it bisects South and North Streets. Free parking is readily available. You'll notice the construction of the commuter rail line to Boston, but it doesn't suffocate the charm of the town center.

The name on everyone's lips is Square Café. Open for lunch and dinner, this airy restaurant, tastefully decorated in pale green and soft neutrals, boasts an executive chef and an extensive cocktail menu. Packed even on a weekday with ladies who lunch, the menu comprises a variety of filling, protein-topped salads and hearty sandwiches for non-dieters. Try the ginger, brown sugar-braised pork sandwich for $10.50. The dinner menu, slanted toward seafood, is divided into small-plate entrées for under $20 and large-plate entrées in the $20+ range.

If you can't squeeze into the Square, amble down the street to The Snug, a classic Irish pub in appearance (dark paneled wood galore) serving American comfort food. It's open for breakfast, lunch and dinner and calls itself the "Home of the Perfect Pint"—which perhaps explains why the younger crowd likes to hang out there at night.

Where to Shop

We won't lie to you, if you have your heart set on whale-embroidered pink and green pants, you'll find them in Hingham. Or maybe you just want to accessorize your preppy look with a canvas boat tote with floral straps? If so, head straight to Island in the Square on Main St., which offers goods from both Lily Pulitzer and Vineyard Vines.

But there is one store that all by itself is worth the trip from Boston, and preppy is not the word for it. Chelsea Orr opened Chel Bella on Memorial Day 2005. The 26-year-old's store looks like a funky vintage boutique crammed with finds. In fact, it's a mix of top designers in a range of prices. You'll find everything from stacks of designer denim (latest arrivals: Citizens) to a shelf full of Michael Stars' basic tees in a rainbow of colors. We dare you to get out of there without succumbing to an eye-catching bag or one of the Rachel Wassman jeweled watches with fabric wristbands.

Where to Get Gorgeous

With national magazine recognition, AZ Studio/AZure Spa should easily meet the highest standards. Of special interest is the Sundari Facial, based on supermodel Christy Turlington's Ayurvedic Skin Care line. First, you receive an analysis of your dosha or skin type. After the more usual facial steps, you'll end with the essential oil that's best for your skin. The spa also offers manicures and pedicures with a floral twist. Choose the Red Flower Ritual manicure and pedicure and breathe in aromas from a red, flower-scented candle while you get your treatment. The Kai manicure and pedicure includes a blend of Gardenia and white exotic flowers.

LEXINGTON

If you were paying attention in history class, you'll instantly associate Lexington with the Revolutionary War. Sure, there are plenty of revolutionary war sites in Boston, but Lexington is where it all began. This was Paul Revere's destination, and it was where the Minutemen gathered to face the Redcoats.

If all of this is ringing only a distant bell of recognition, you can refresh your memory at the National Heritage Museum, located at the intersection of Route 2A and Mass. Ave. The museum has free admission, and it features a standing exhibit on the Revolutionary War with rotating exhibits on various aspects of American history. The museum is open Mondays through Saturdays from 10 am to 5 pm, and Sundays from noon to 5 pm.

Once you've finished stimulating your gray matter, explore downtown Lexington. That famous Minuteman statue at the Battle Green gazes over a wide variety of shops, cafés and restaurants along Mass. Ave. (as well as up a few side streets).

Lexx sports warm woods and an unintimidating, upscale pub menu. The front of the restaurant feels free-wheeling and date-friendly, with high bar tables and stools looking out onto Mass. Ave. Across the street, Not Your Average Joe's lures in the rest of the bar crowd and more with a two-page cocktail list. Yes, it's a chain, but a chain that delivers fun drinks, decent wine and good, affordable food, with an Asian–Italian–Cajun–American fusion menu broad enough to keep everyone happy on date night.

Where to Shop

Start at the Crafty Yankee, a locally owned shop that sells New England gifts and crafts. Right next door, sister store Small Indulgences sells women's clothes, plus accessories and leather goods from the Brighton Collection. Don't miss the other Small Indulgences down the block, which focuses on accessories, including bags and jewelry made by local artisans. You might also want to take a pass through Cohoes. Described by one local as "a high-end Marshall's," the two-story women's department store sells discounted fashions from Fendi, Valentino and Calvin Klein, as well as Nine West and 1928 Jewelry. If you can't get enough of the locally produced goods, make another stop at the Lexington Arts & Crafts Society, and on your way out of town, grab a fresh-baked pick-me-up at Rosie's Bakery.

Where to Get Gorgeous

Lexingtonians love Indulgence Day Spa (no relation to the Small Indulgences stores). In addition to weekday specials, they have some tempting packages—if you have two and a half hours to spare, for example, you can sample the Mini Indulgence. For $120, choose between a spa facial and Swedish massage, plus get a manicure and "footial," which includes an herbal soak, manicure of the toes, foot filing and sloughing, and foot massage.

NEWBURYPORT

Ah, Newburyport. Gateway to the beaches of Plum Island and bir ing grounds of the Parker River National Wildlife Refuge, this a most-too-picturesque town at the mouth of the Merrimac River home to a thriving theater and live music scene, majestic examples New England architecture and a wide choice of parks and other pr served wild spaces.

None of this will matter one whit, however, if you are a shopper, b cause the brick and cobblestone streets of Newburyport offer up sho ping choices deep and wide enough to keep even hardcore shopaholi in a daze for days. Clothing and shoes, housewares and food, jewel and accessories and cosmetics and gifts, all intermingled with a plea ingly wide range of restaurants and watering holes, mean the only thin it's easy to part with in Newburyport is your money.

Particularly in the summer months, waterfront stalwarts like Michael' Harborside, The Black Cow and, at the end of the causeway to th beach, the Plum Island Grille are filled with a rocking crowd of 2C somethings showing off their tans and slurping up the cocktail of th moment. But even the most toasted are willing to venture away fro the waterfront to try the new venues that seem to perpetually pop up i town. Two relatively recent additions worth checking out: The Kiw Grille and Agavé. Formally called The Kiwi Grille at Steeple Hall, thi funky eatery in a colorfully painted, church-like building dishes ou New Zealand favorites like ostrich, rack of lamb and lamb foreshank in termingled with seafood dishes like peekytoe crab salad, spiny lobste lemongrass bisque and lobster-crusted halibut, all in a room that's mini malist and modern-looking. Agavé Mexican Bistro goes upscale on th south-of-the-border theme, with grilled salad and tampiqueña appetiz ers (beef lightly seared with a fresh salsa), caldo tlapleño soup (Mexica chicken soup) and mariscos del caribe (Mexican shrimp cocktail wit fresh shrimp, scallops and habañeros), all of which can be washed dow with any of 60 tequilas. The restaurant sports a warm and inviting ba downstairs, a second-floor dining room, and a third-floor lounge are with leather couches and a fireplace. If thirst is your main concern, po into Rosie O'Shea's, a spacious and authentic-looking Irish pub, for pint of your favorite brew, or head down near the water for a blast of caf feine from Plum Island Coffee Roasters.

Where to Shop

Where to start? The Tannery, a collection of old mills that has been transformed into a mini-shopping haven. Inside, Red Bird Trading Co. specializes in an explosion of the baroque for the home—furni ture, bedding, linens, pillows, incidental pieces, as well as clothing, jewelry, lingerie and bath products. A few doors down, Wishbasket takes a slightly preppier approach to housewares and hostess gifts; The Ruby Slipper offers costume jewelry with an emphasis on the fun and the funky; and the wonderful and welcoming Jabberwocky Bookshop makes you remember why independent book stores are so much better than mega-chains. Head a few blocks back to the center of town for some serious, and seriously high-end, clothes shopping, primarily at Azure and Native Sun. Mary Jane offers clothing that's slightly less stratospheric, price-wise, and a good selection of cool footwear as well. When all the opulence starts to get to you, recharge at the beautifully old-fashioned Fowles: part newsstand, part lunch counter, where a grilled cheese and a Spiderman comic book should return you to your senses.

Where to Get Gorgeous

Hands down, Interlocks Salon & Day Spa is the place in town—the place on the entire North Shore, in fact—to spend the day getting cut, highlighted, primped and primed. The huge, well-lit, sparkling clean space feels less like a salon than a boutique hospital (only without the bloody parts) and the spa menu, which runs to several pages, serves up such goodies as facials from Decleor (Paris), Dibi (Italy) and Plantogen (New Zealand); ultrasound and microdermabrasion; hot stone and maternity massages; Vichy showers; and tanning. Downtown, Be Pink sells such high-end lines as Nars, Bliss and Farmaesthetics, and offers of-the-moment beauty treatments like eyelash extensions.

WELLESLEY

We admit it—we have a soft spot for touring college campuses: the beautiful grounds and architecture, all that history, usually with a tasteful little museum or two thrown in the mix. Plus performing arts and the requisite theater playing an obscure art house movie you've always meant to see.

Wellesley College has all of that. Sure, there are plenty of college campuses in Boston. But Wellesley has room to spread out over 450 acres, including space for botanical gardens. Check out the school's Web site before you go to see the exhibitions at the Davis Museum and elsewhere around campus.

When you've finished touring the campus, walk out the main gates onto Central Street and you'll find downtown Wellesley spread out before you.

Where to Eat and Drink

The town's crown jewel is Blue Ginger, one of the top-rated, most famous restaurants in the Boston area. You're probably familiar with the name Ming Tsai, even if you haven't seen either of his two Food Network shows, East Meets West and Ming's Quest, or his latest venture on PBS, Simply Ming. Try his cuisine for yourself at Blue Ginger, described as his "East meets West bistro." You're best off making reservations before you leave Boston—make that at least several days before.

Though Wellesley is a dry town, Blue Ginger does serve wine, and the dining experience definitely counts as a splurge for most pocketbooks. Dinner entrées start at $21 and run into the $30 range. Try the pan-seared scallops with miso Koshi-Hikari risotto. And be sure to save room for Blue Ginger's take on Boston Cream Pie with jasmine tea cream. If you're on a budget, lunch might be the way to go. Sake-miso-marinated Alaskan butterfish is $33 at night and $21 during the day. It's a smaller portion, but with the same flavor. Be forewarned, though, that the restaurant's closed on Sunday.

If you can't manage to get into Blue Ginger, pop into that other celebrity chef's place, Todd English's Figs. Satisfy your hunger with pizzas and pasta, all under $20 for both lunch and dinner.

Where to Shop

Central Street is lined with stores. Don't miss the independent bookstore Wellesley Booksmith, sister to Brookline Booksmith. The shop boasts a newly opened used-book cellar (through the children's section) and prides itself on hosting a wide range of author events, like a recent evening with Julia Alvarez, author of In the Time of the Butterflies and How the Garcia Girls Lost Their Accents.

Wellesley has its share of suburban soccer moms, but college girls round out the rest of the customer demographic, which means it's possible to find some suitably stylish clothes. For a young vibe, pounding music, and lots of bags, visit Luisa, Luisa. Or stop down the street at Betsy's for a selection of hip, casual clothes. For any kind of sports gear you could possibly need, explore the cavernous Thunder—The Sports Source.

Where to Get Gorgeous

Wellesley has plenty of choices for spas. One local favorite is the original Grettacole spa. If your friends have been calling you Casper the Friendly Ghost of late, try the Gretta Body Bronze with Exfoliation for $115—or without exfoliation for $60. All first-time clients receive a personalized Trish McEvoy makeup consultation after services. IB

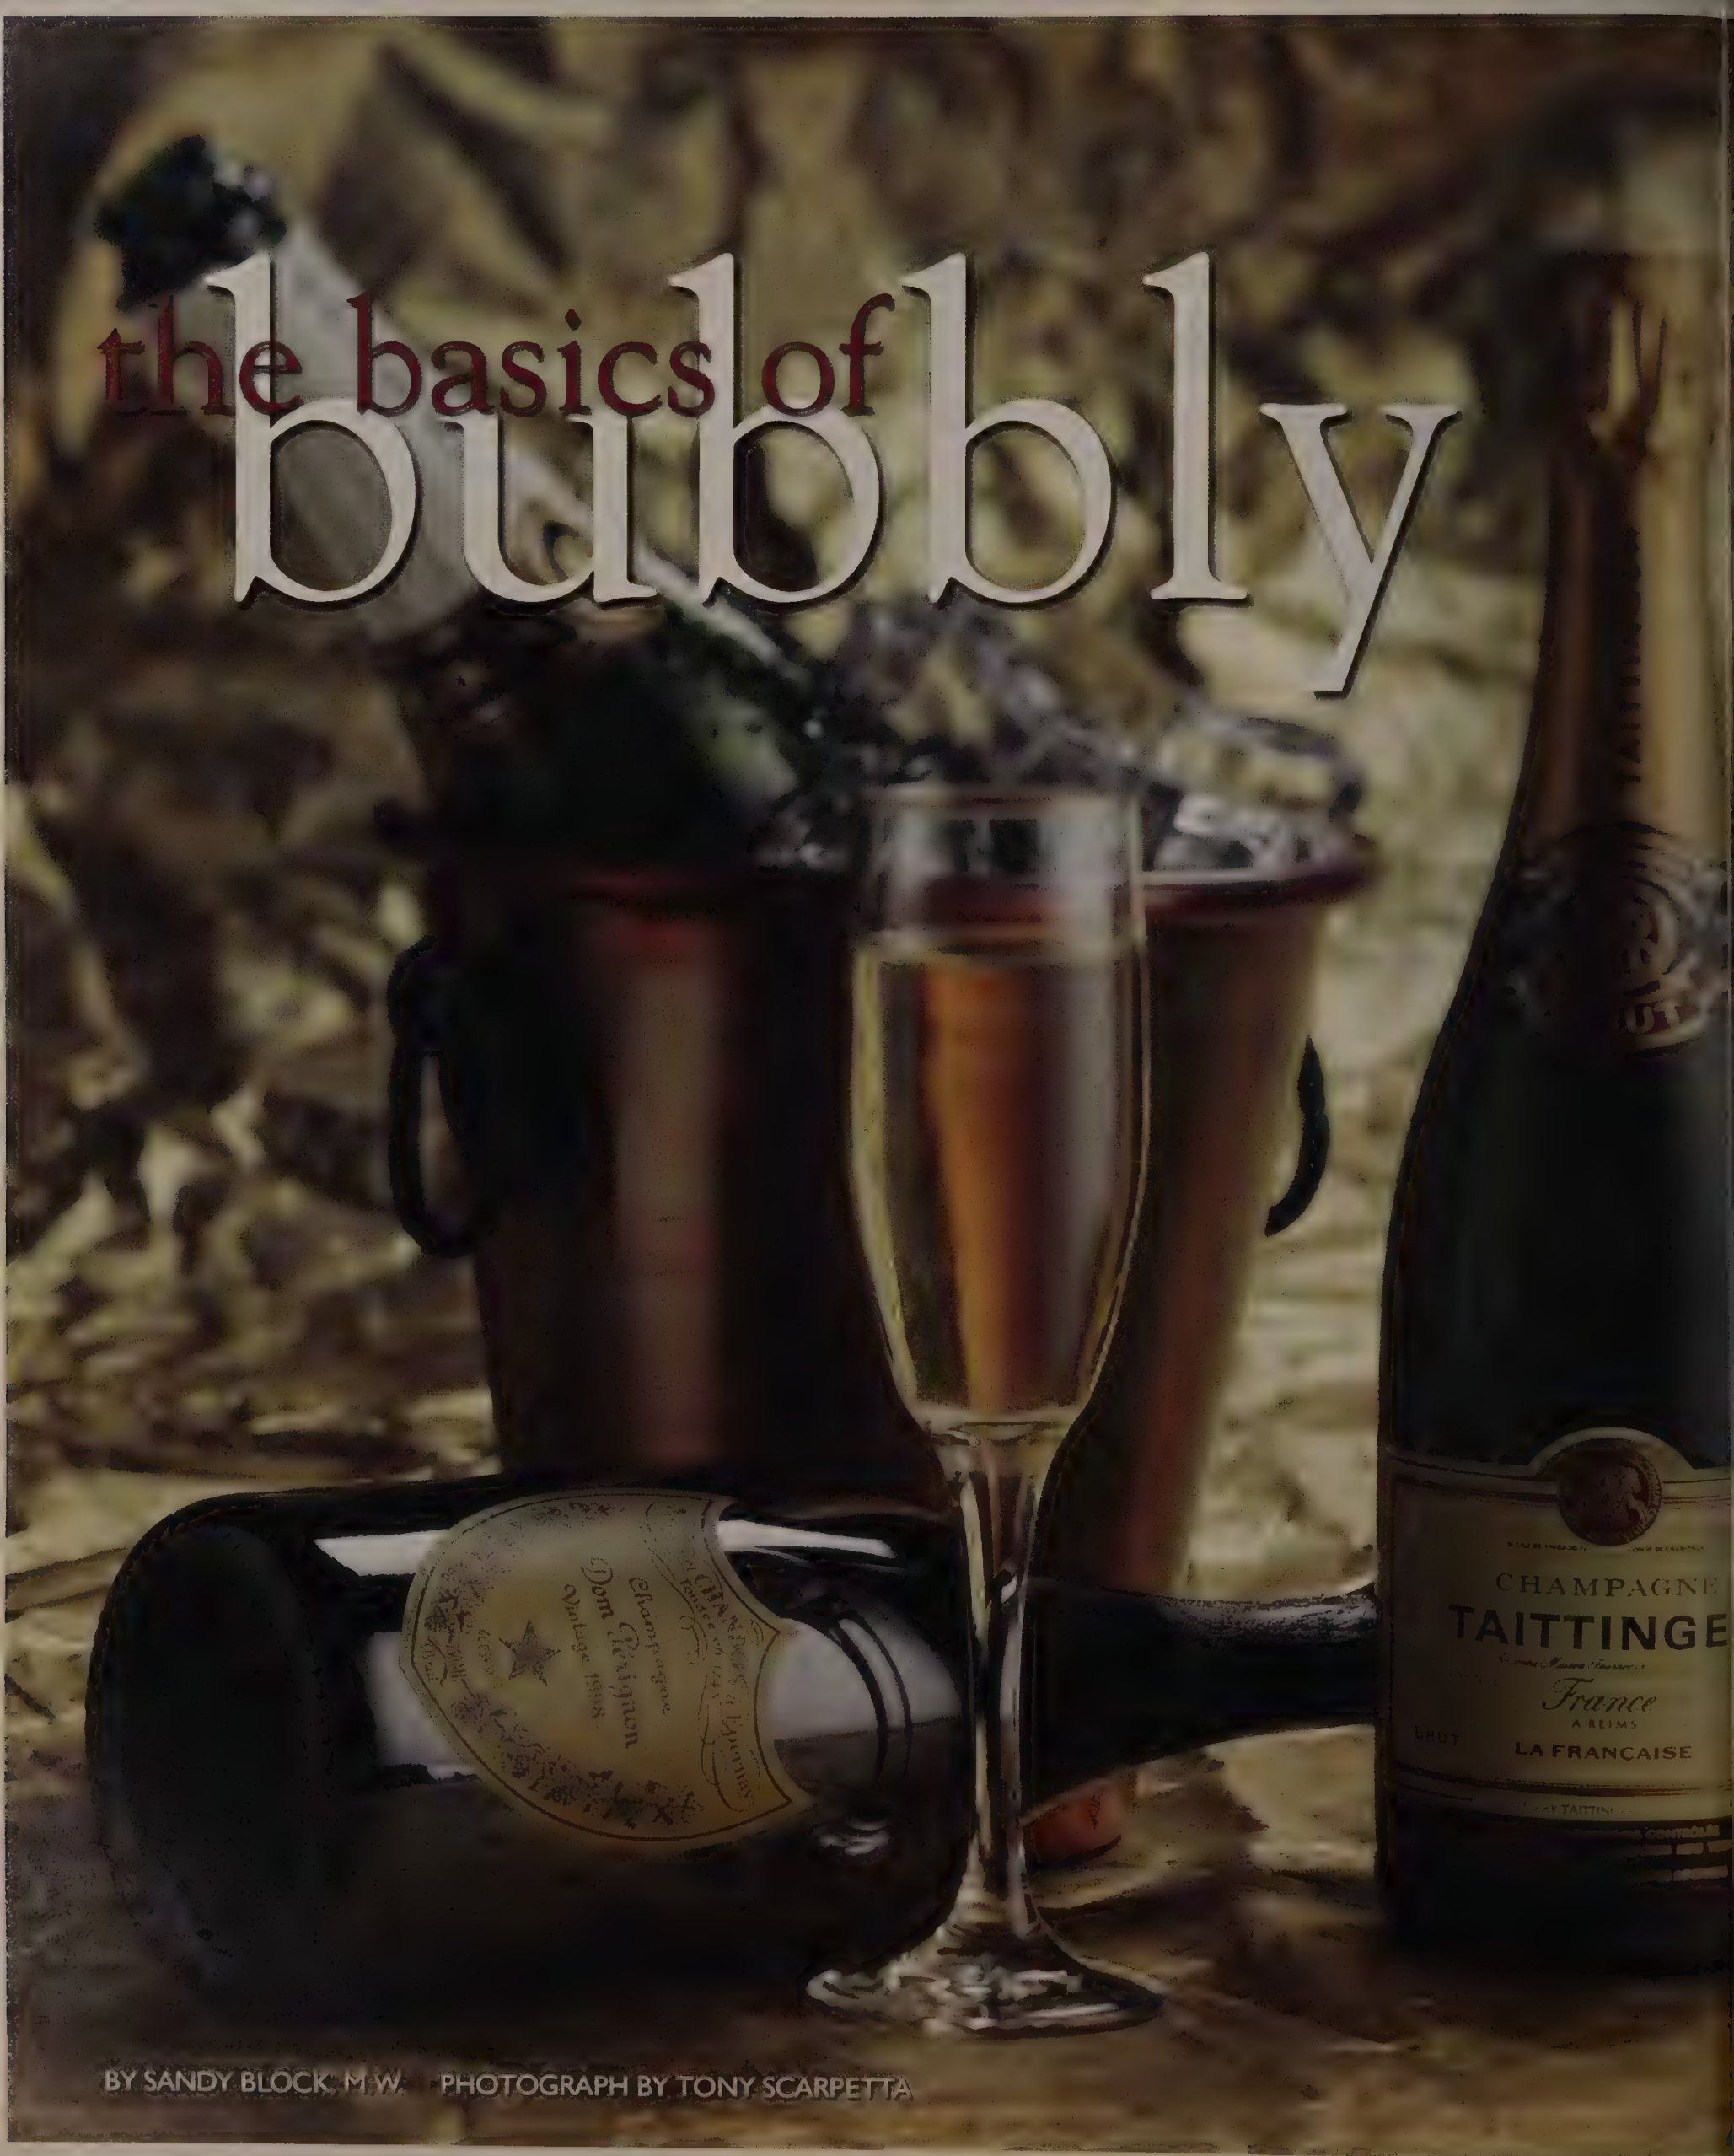
the basics of bubbly



BY SANDY BLOCK, M.W. PHOTOGRAPH BY TONY SCARPETTA

CHAMPAGNE COURTESY OF BAUER WINES

A MASTER OF WINE OFFERS A BRIEF HISTORY OF CHAMPAGNE AND TIPS FOR WHAT TO SIP WHILE RINGING IN '06.

his is the time for all you closet champagne drinkers to go nuts and start flaunting it. It's amazing that the season in which the vast majority of champagne is sold (November and December) is also the time you'll find the best prices by far, without even looking. It's called competition. Of course, best pricing when it comes to true champagne doesn't mean what it once did: Just try spending less than $25 a bottle. You might be able to do it, but are you sure it's the real stuff?

So what's this about "true" champagne? First, a little lesson in history and geography. Champagne is the name of a cold region in northern France, near Paris, where grapes struggle to ripen each year and usually fail, but where, nonetheless, vintners have been making wine since antiquity (though not sparkling wine necessarily; that's an innovation of the last 300 years). Champagne's also the name of a glorious wine. Its production entails a slow, painstaking process that creates the characteristic sparkle. The bubbles arise from a second fermentation inside the actual bottle you buy, but the critical step involves aging the wine and then removing the yeasts trapped within the bottle without the fizz evaporating—no easy feat, and it requires a lot of different steps taken over a period of years. There are quicker ways to introduce bubbles and get credible, sometimes even delicious results. But none of these shortcuts yields the real deal. So unless the wine comes from Champagne and unless the winemaker uses the approved technique (the so-called méthode traditionelle), it ain't champagne no matter what the label says.

Oh, the label. It may walk, talk and bubble like champagne, it may even say champagne, but if there's any other geographic indication at all (such as California or New York) it's a cheaper imitation. The driest champagnes will say "Brut." In the wacky terminology of wine, if the label tells you it's "Extra Dry" or "Dry," the champagne's actually sweet. There are some delicious, flavorful champagnes that are rosés, and you might find a bottle labeled "Blanc de Blancs" (meaning it's light and delicate, made with chardonnay), or "Blanc de Noirs" (meaning it's full and perhaps earthy, made with pinot), but most of the bottles you'll encounter are blends of various grapes and vintages and they will say "Brut NV" (or "non-vintage") after the brand name. As in "Moët & Chandon, Brut NV." When you buy one this time of year you can hold onto it for several months without fear of its going bad, and you don't even have to lay the bottle on its side, as you do with most other wines.

> We're buying greater quantities of champagne this year than last, even though it's more expensive and sales of French wines without bubbles have declined an average of 5 percent.

Although champagne costs more money than most of us usually spend, it's worth it because of its unique origins, which impart a particular finesse of aroma and flavor. Champagne's special taste, along with promotional efforts by the major producers to convince us that this is THE wine of luxurious celebration, have helped champagne buck the slide in popularity of French wines overall in this country. We're buying greater quantities of champagne this year than last, even though it's more expensive and sales of French wines without bubbles have declined an average of 5 percent since 2004. But champagne's been on a 200-year roll as the wine of toasts and commemoration, and it's unlikely that this winning streak will end any time soon, especially since quality is impeccable across the board. The largest houses on the U.S. market, Moët & Chandon and Veuve Clicquot, dominate sales, so the following are my picks from among the others. Except for the Dom, all run between $30-$40 a bottle, depending on the store.

Taittinger Brut "La Française" NV. The character of every champagne's Brut NV reflects the somewhat nebulous "house style"—nebulous not to the champagne company but to consumers, most of whom buy more on brand attributes and associations rather than flavor. This is a blended product that's supposed to taste the same from one year to the next, yet there are always different vintages composing it. So how do they do it? Each company buys grapes from certain areas within Champagne that impart a specific character to the wine. In Taittinger's case, the company owns a larger percentage of the vineyards that produce its wine, and many of these are located in the Côte des Blancs, Champagne's prime chardonnay area. As such, Taittinger's "La Française" always has a preponderance of chardonnay. This wine is yeasty and toasty, with a fragrant apple blossom aroma. It's bone-dry, light in body, and has a really nice core of penetrating acidity, with a finish like a Granny Smith. The flavors are very pure and lingering. They pair beautifully with a plate of smoked salmon.

Pol Roger Brut NV. The opposite of Taittinger stylistically, the equally fine, family-owned Pol Roger has a fuller aroma of ginger, orange and spices, and it tastes firmer and more powerfully structured. Somewhat reserved and understated, with a mineral, slightly lemony edge, the fruit is beautifully balanced, soft and bone-dry. A favorite of Winston Churchill, the company has named one of its top cuvées (top-vintage champagnes that are produced from the region's best grapes and given extra-long aging) in his honor, but the basic Brut NV, while reserved and understated, is a substantial, medium-bodied champagne. Pair it with a poached filet of sole or halibut, particularly served with a creamy sauce.

Laurent Perrier Brut NV. Much larger in production than either of the above two companies, Laurent-Perrier still has something of a boutique image because of its relatively soft sales in the States. I thought it the finest Brut Non-Vintage I tasted this season. The wine has an interesting bread dough, sweet herb, mineral-like aroma. It's beautifully balanced, creamy in texture yet with firm acidity. Characterized more by finesse than power, its dry, understated minerality carries through all the way to the finish. Serve it with a simple boiled lobster.

Dom Pérignon. If you're going for broke, Dom Pérignon ($140) is a great choice. The fact that this wine is an icon, to some even a cliché, in no way negates its status as a magnificent champagne. The current vintage, the 33rd produced, is 1998. Its subtle, flowery, wheat-like aroma, with hints of lemon and crisp apple, results from the seven years the wine has been aging on the yeast. Slightly herb-like in flavor, but very clean, pure and elegant, this champagne has an incomparably long finish that hints of citrus. The advantage of Dom Pérignon among all the prestige cuvées is that it's available everywhere and instantly recognizable. I enjoyed it with sea urchin and caviar, the salty flavors of which brought out more personality in this young DP. It's got several years of aging ahead of it if you want to put a bottle or two away. And if you want to be really trendy and extravagant, go for the Dom Pérignon Rosé 1995. Why 1995? Because, thanks largely to its higher price, it takes longer to sell. That's actually an advantage, because it's more developed and aromatic than its younger, paler sibling. Cinnamon, tarragon and tangerine are all present in the aroma, and the flavors are lingering and herb-like. Should you be lucky enough to find it, expect to pay somewhere in the neighborhood of $150. mountain MANIA

WHEN THE LIFT SHUTS DOWN, THE FUN IS JUST BEGINNING AT THESE NEW ENGLAND SKI RESORTS.

Maria said it best: The hills are alive with the sound of music. Here in the Northeast, it's not just about the fresh snow, clean air and outdoor exercise anymore. The nightlife at ski resorts around New England is legit, rivaling city bars for their quality music, rowdy crowds and assortment of special events and parties. But figuring out where to go and who's got the best scene for you can be a major research project. As with snowflakes, no two ski resorts are exactly alike. Lucky for you, we're here to help. We surveyed northern New England's ski scene and put together this guide to some of the best local resorts and their entertainment offerings. Check them out and head for the slopes.

SUGARLOAF MOUNTAIN

Carrabassett Valley, Maine (800-843-5623). www.sugarloaf.com

Sugarloaf isn't a mountain for the timid. More than a five-hour drive from Boston in good weather, it's the only resort in New England above the tree line, with challenging terrain and conditions. And being so far to the north, it's also very cold. Here you'll find a mix of skiers and snowboarders—Maine students, outdoorsy hippies, Canucks, Bostonians, New Yorkers and hard-core New Englanders who are willing to drive far for some of the best terrain in the area. But as for crowds on the hill, you won't find them here. If elbowroom is what you're looking for, "The Loaf" is sure to deliver.

Lift Tickets: $61, daily

Best Bars and Music Venues: Located at the base of the mountain, [illegible] is a legend for true Loafers (as the resort's devotees are called). Locals and tourists alike are drawn to the lively après ski scene, known for its big burgers with all the fixin's, homemade soups and live music, making it a good place to stop for lunch or to end a long day on the hill.

For late-night recreation, Loafers swarm to the Widowmaker Lounge. With live music every night and several popular Boston bands playing regularly, it's where to go if you're not planning on first tracks the next morning. This winter, some bands featured are the Adam Ezra Group, Jan. 4-7; Rhythm Method, Jan. 13-14; Motor Booty Affair, Jan. 22; Dub Station, Jan. 27-28; Swerve, Feb. 3-4; Skeletones, Feb. 17-18; Chicken Slacks, March 3-4; and Super Honey, March 10-11.

[illegible], another locals' spot, is located off the mountain on the access road. A bit more low-key (you're sure to see a few dreadlocks and Carhart jackets here), it's a traditional mountain-town brewpub, complete with pool tables and a slew of microbrews on tap.

Special Events: How do you get people to a ski resort in the boondocks of Maine? Book big bands for the annual [illegible]. Throughout the season, headliner bands fill the King Pine Room at the base area for sold-out shows. On Jan. 28, Big Head Todd and the Monsters perform. Feb. 25 and March 18 are also Bud Light Concert Series nights, with headlining bands to be announced soon.

SUNDAY RIVER SKI RESORT

Sunday River Access Road, Newry, Maine (207-824-3000). www.sundayriver.com

Sunday River has, hands down, some of the best snow conditions in New England. But take note: While not as far as Sugarloaf, it's still about a four-hour drive from Boston. Don't expect too rowdy of an evening; families abound at the River. But there are plenty of options for the younger crowd throughout the winter at the resort, on the access road and in nearby Bethel, with live music nightly.

Lift Tickets: $59, daily

Best Bars and Music Venues: Thumper's Night Club, located at the mountain, is where it's at for headliner bands. How about the Wailers on Thursday, Jan. 5? That's reason enough to get an early start to your weekend. It's also an opportunity to see big-name bands in a relatively intimate setting (Thumper's has a capacity of 800, small compared to venues in the city). Other bookings this season include the Sam Kininger Band on New Year's Eve and the Battle of the College Bands on Jan. 4. Eddie Money's offering two tickets to paradise on Feb. 19, and more bands will be announced for dates through April.

[illegible], located at the base area, is known for its après ski scene, with local bands playing nightly. Other spots for the best après ski (or past-après, into-the-wee-hours-of-the-night) scene include the Sunday River Brewing Company and the [illegible] on the access road, near the resort. Both are where the locals go for a variety of good beers, quality food and well-known bands throughout the winter.

Special Events: The Russian/American Kids Circus performs Jan. 14-15. It features aerial and acrobatic stunts from youngsters ages 6-18 in a fully staged circus tent at the base of the mountain. At the end of the season, [illegible] weekend March 31-April 2 pays tribute not just to Jimmy Buffet, but to spring itself, with pond-skimming contests, several live bands playing outdoors, parties at the base areas and the Bust 'n' Burn mogul competition open to the public.

VERMONT

KILLINGTON MOUNTAIN

4763 Killington Road
Killington, Vt. (800-734-9435). www.killington.com

Like to burn your candle at both ends? Killington is your spot, with a nightlife as good as, if not better than, the daytime activities. K-towners like their music and their bars, and the trails and lodges teem with designer-clad girls from New York and Boston in ski-bunny suits and yuppies in North Face garb, as well as hippies and snowboarders from Burlington. The variety makes for a lively scene any night of the week.

Lift Tickets: $69, one day; [illegible], two days

Best Bars and Music Venues: Both the Pickle Barrel and the Wobbly Barn are known for booking quality bands throughout the season. Such headliners as Rusted Root, the Samples and Matisyahu make both venues worth a visit this season. But some of the best acts to see at both bars are names you may not recognize—local East Coast and Canadian bands that play in Killington and other areas around Vermont regularly. From funk to jazz to blues and straight-up rock, the Barrel and the Barn keep it lively.

Special Events: The Wobbly Barn Mardi Gras Party celebrates its 10th anniversary Feb. 28. Costumes are required, but don't fret: The K-1 Lodge on the mountain provides mask-making materials from 3-5 pm the day of the event, with music during the day from the band Los Blancos. Satisfy your post-ski hunger with a Louisiana-style meal in the dining room, then join the festivities in the nightclub starting at 8 pm with the zydeco band Mango Jam. [illegible], March 9-11, is a snowboarder's weekend with a half-pipe competition, a bachelor auction at the Wobbly Barn, live music and several other activities to raise money for breast cancer research and treatments. [illegible], kicking off March 23, bring together more than 200 of the top freestyle athletes in the country to compete and party in style for four days. For more extreme sport fun, the [illegible] on April 8-9 features snowboard competitions, outdoor parties, BBQ at the base area and live music. If that's too extreme, April 15 brings the [illegible], a tribute to the Grateful Dead where cover bands play Dead tunes all day and night, sweetened by free samples of Ben & Jerry's ice cream.

SUGARBUSH MOUNTAIN

1840 Sugarbush Access Road
Warren, Vt. (802-583-6300). www.sugarbush.com

The welcome sign at Sugarbush should say, "No High-Strung City Types Allowed." As local musician Aaron Hersey says, "This is where hippies and rednecks hang out together. But everyone is welcome." In fact, it's tough to be stressed out here: A happy-go-lucky attitude prevails in this true Vermont mountain town, located three and a half hours from Boston, and you'd do well to leave the urban angst at home. Other benefits? The number of skiers at this resort is low, snowfall's high and the nightlife isn't bad, either. Mellow is the word for the Bush.

Lift Tickets: $63, one day; [illegible], two days

Best Bars and Music Venues: The Blue Tooth, located on the resort's access road, is all about the funky jazz and jazzy funk. The fun continues until 2 am on the weekends, with a variety of bands to party and dance to. Acts at The Local Folks [illegible], formerly the Mad Mountain Tavern, run the gamut of musical genres. Soul, rock, country, funk and jam bands from Boston and Providence perform here throughout the winter. More than 16 microbrews are on tap, and they make their own smokehouse BBQ. If you just can't tear yourself away from the slopes until later in the day, the Phoenix, slope-side at the Lincoln Peak Village, has the best après scene. Here you'll see tourists mingling with locals and mountain employees just off their shifts.

Special Events: On April 1, the entire resort gets irie for the Sugarbush Reggae [illegible], with live bands, food, beer specials and the annual ski and snowboard pond-skimming contest—all outside in the sunshine.

STOWE MOUNTAIN

5781 Mountain Road
Stowe, Vt. (800-253-4754). www.stowe.com

Stowe is the perfect mountain for those looking to relax and chill out after a day on the hill, but with a happening nightlife too. In general, the resort hosts a cross between the young city crowd at Killington and the mellow, woodsy crowd at Sugarbush. A variety of East Coasters make the trip regularly to rejuvenate while they party.

Lift Tickets: $74, one day; $120, two days

Best Bars and Music Venues: The Matterhorn hosts touring bands in a small but lively space. The 20-something crowd dominates the après ski scene here, which includes sushi, pizza and pool tables. Meanwhile, 30-somethings flock to the [illegible], a true Vermont bar with the atmosphere of a rustic barn and a rocking music lineup that also features headliner bands throughout the season. Locals hang out at The Shed for the best burger in town and the Shed's own microbrews, not to mention an atmosphere that's cozy and relaxed.

Special Events: The University of Vermont Winter Carnival brings together the top collegiate ski racers in the country to vie for spots at the NCAA nationals during this two-day competition on Feb. 3-4. And if there's one thing ski racers should be known for (other than their badass athletic abilities), it'd have to be partying. The weekend promises the chance to see some hotties in tight racing suits showing off their stuff, with parties into the night. The Stowe Derby, a tradition at the resort slated for Feb. 26, is the oldest downhill/cross-country ski competition in the country, with over 1,000 competitors. International athletes, amateurs, recreational skiers and kids travel over 10 miles. Anyone who's brave enough to endure the pain is welcome to compete.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Route 302, Bartlett, N.H. (603-374-2368). www.attitash.com

Route 16, Pinkham Notch, N.H. (603-466-3326). www.skiwildcat.com

Both Attitash and Wildcat are close to North Conway, a mountain town worth a visit in its own right any time of year. But winter brings an eclectic bunch of people to the area—from skiers, ice climbers and snow mobilers to shoppers searching for bargains at the many outlets downtown. A mix of restaurants and bars are scattered around town, not far from Attitash. But for a more secluded vacation, Wildcat is a little further away from North Conway and has a more remote feel, with fewer visitors on any given day. Located in the shadow of Mount Washington, Wildcat's colder than cold, but the views are worth enduring the frigid temps. For a luxurious ski trip, the Mount Washington Hotel is close to Wildcat and serves a four-course dinner nightly accompanied by an orchestra. An ideal trip to the area would allow a couple of days to check out Wildcat and Attitash, with a couple of nights to party in North Conway.

Lift Tickets: Attitash: [illegible], one day; [illegible], two days. Wildcat: [illegible], one day; [illegible], two days

Best Bars and Music Venues: Ptarmigan's Pub at Attitash is worth a stop for slope-side après fun, with live music on the weekends and outdoor concerts when the weather permits. The Red Parka is on the access road to Attitash and is the best spot for live music from local bands, good pub food and scoping out the locals' scene on the weekends. While there's no nightlife at Wildcat to speak of, North Conway has a variety of restaurants and bars close by. Try the [illegible] or the Moat Mountain Smokehouse and Brewing Co.

Special Events: The Budweiser Spring Mania is a weeklong celebration at Attitash, March 17-25. It features the Grand Stand Mogul Jam on Saturday, March 18, with reggae music all day long on the Snow Stage outside of Ptarmigan's Pub. The event closes with the On Snow Golf Tournament and a performance by the funk/jazz/blues band the Boston Horns. iB

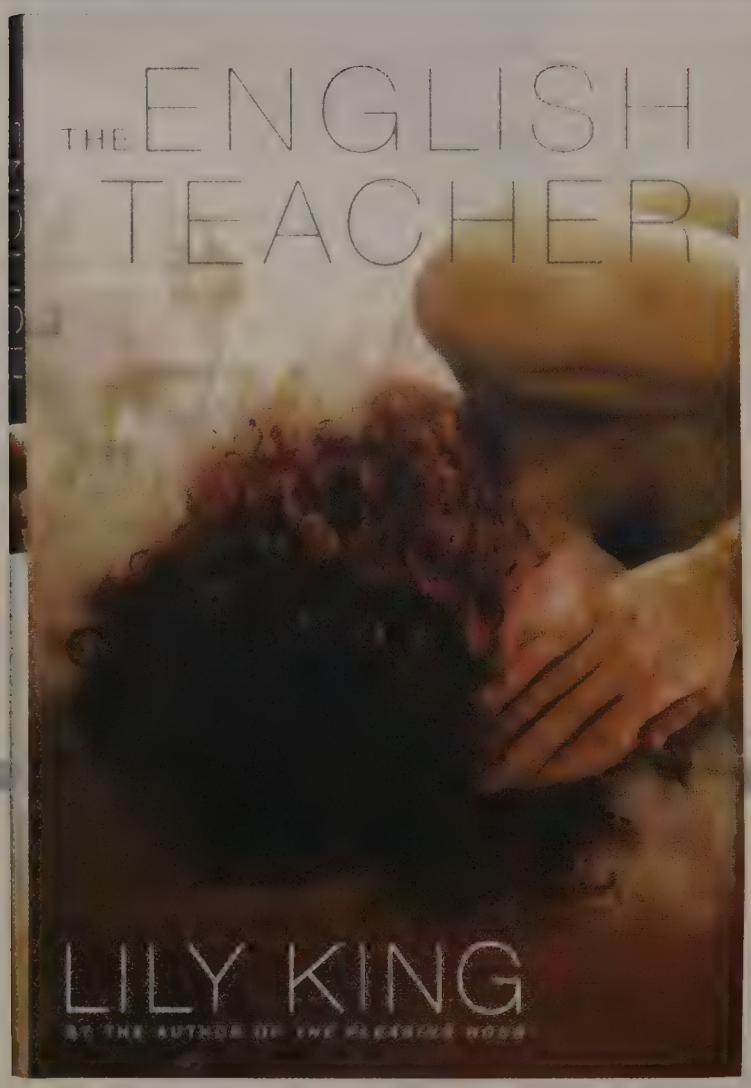
SERENDIPITOUS SHOPPING: OUR UNFETTERED CORRESPONDENT SEEKS OUT THE SALUBRIOUS AND THE CEREBRAL.

BY MOPSY STRANGE KENNEDY



STEPPING IN AND OUT OF A FAMILY

The English Teacher* is the latest offering from Cambridge native Lily King, who also wrote The Pleasing Hour.

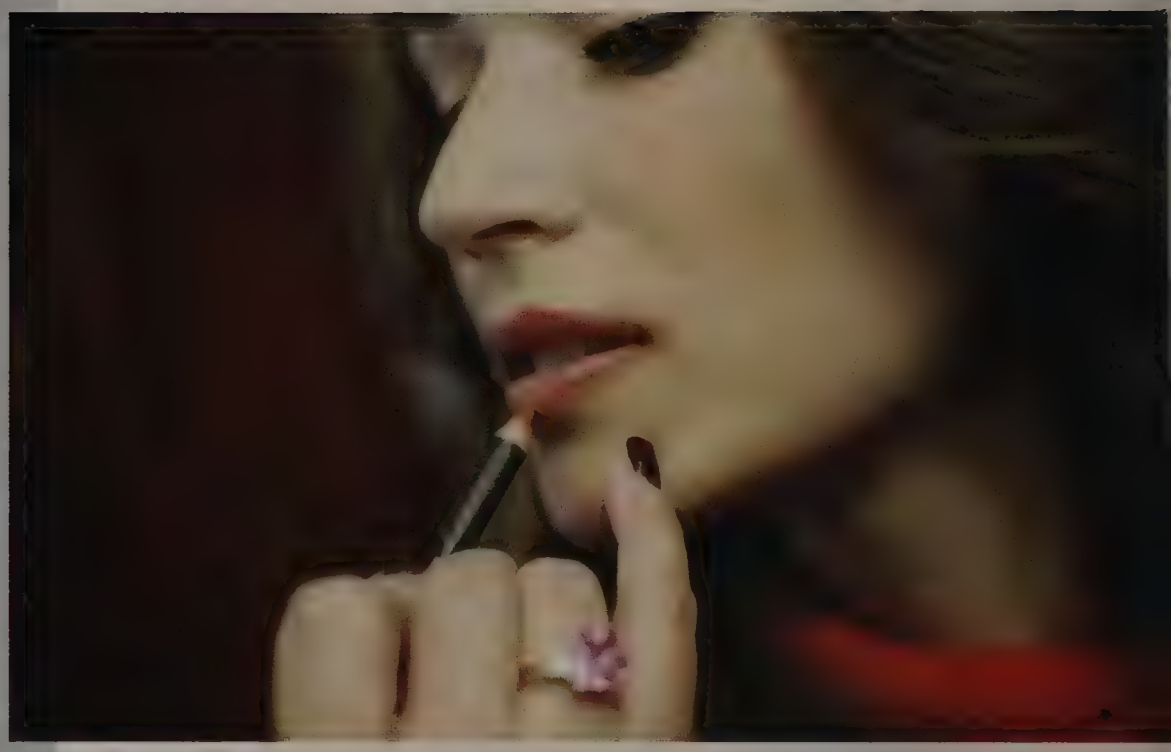
For 15 years, Vida Avery has lived with her son, Peter. She teaches English at a school housed in a mansion once owned by her grandparents. Their bond, both close and uneasy, is threatened by Vida's whirlwind marriage to widower Tom. He's the father of three, the most notable of whom, Stuart, has taken refuge in icily detached stances and pronouncements as a response to the loss of his mother. Peter makes appealing, rather awkward stumblings toward his new family, into unrequited yearning for a girl and around the edges of the cool scene that doesn't welcome him. In the bathroom, he makes a kind of kindred contact with a photograph of Tom's dead wife, noting the oddity of his invasion into her former life. Vida, a marital misfit herself, in spite of having a sweet husband, is a rather fierce teacher with a connection to the eponymous, outcast heroine of Tess of the D'Urbervilles. As things unravel—her dog dies, and it's clear that this was her closest relationship—Peter, willy nilly, rises into his grownup self. King's grace of pace lends a pearly air to the subtle inwardness of the characters.



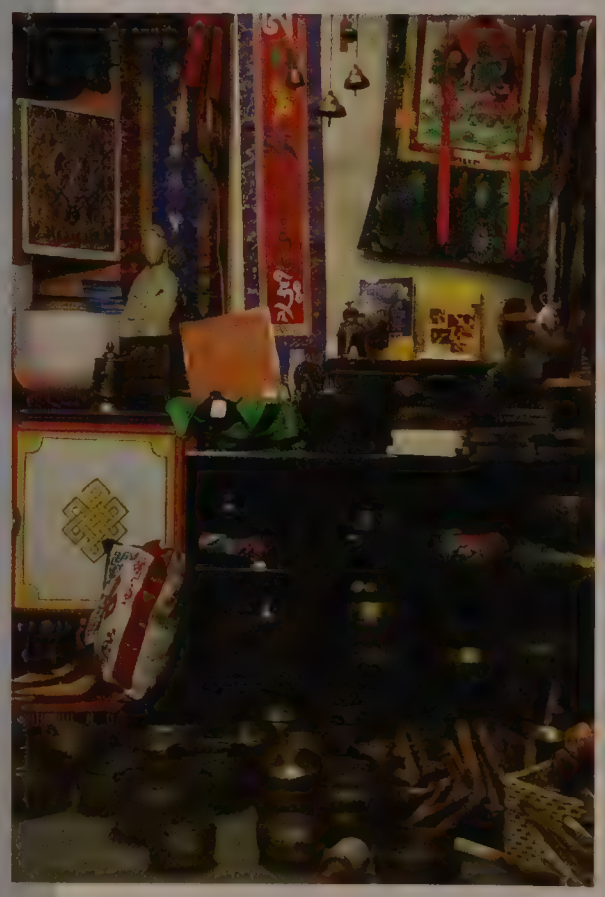
ADVENTURE IN BEAUTY FOR GIRLS

Wishes for Girls is a new beauty studio for girls, guys and even grownups. 34 Main St., Concord (978-369-9699).

Where do girls—littler ones—go to get their tiny tresses treated? To some intimidating ammonia-spritzed salon for gossiping grownups? No way! They should come up the white stairs to this friendly fairyland which is designed and decorated to suit the young, with lots of purple and pink, cute cherubs, a velvet pouf and a cheering poster that promotes good values like "Quell rumors. Touch hearts." It's salon-like but in a cozier, Concord way. The little ones, ages 4-8, can get their hair cut in colorful high-chair-like seats for $25. Haircuts for those between the ages of 9 and 13 are $30, and for the oldies who are ages 14 and up, their haircut will set them back $40. CoCo Grace is a makeup consultant who has created products that are "light on the skin." Wishes For Girls offers hair styling that includes braids, curling iron treatments and updos. The kiddies can get their nails painted in any color of the rainbow with a "mini-mani" or "mini-pedi." Wishes for Girls also makes a good birthday destination: For $50, cake and goody bags are showered on the little tykes. At the in-house photography studio, a minigang can get photographed, and the birthday girl's photo may be incorporated into an imaginary magazine cover adorned with pertinent cover-lines.The proprietor, Rita Greeley, once served THE IMPROPER as photo editor, so she knows a thing or two about picture-taking.

A STORE THAT MAKES YOU FEEL BETTER

Tibet Arts sells Tibetan clothing, jewelry and spiritual healing items made in India and Nepal. 1925A Mass. Ave., Cambridge (781-643-4656). www.tibetarts.com.



Away from the hurly burly of Porter Square, Tibet Arts invites you into its soothing climes. Atmospherically apart from America itself, the store is decorated with gauzy pastel curtains, scented with a light smell of incense and surrounded with the sound of singing bowls which, when tapped with a wooden stick, ring in a way that makes your head feel like it's encircled with gold. The clothes—dresses, handmade jackets and silk scarves—have an exciting, dramatic air, and there's one wonderful hat made of silk and fur that would make an amusing person even more so. Eye-catching rings and bracelets have bold, colorful stones, like chunks of turquoise or coral, or carnelian (for good luck). The store's back area features Buddhist and other spiritual and meditative items—healing banners, prayer flags, CDs and calendars, and books by such spiritual luminaries as the Vietnamese monk Thich Nhat Hanh, the Western nun Pema Chodron and the Dalai Lama. Even a woven rug depicting a tiger is said to be calming. Seeds, a reclining Buddha and travel amulets promise "protection against all obstacles, losses and negativities." Who could resist such comfort and courage?

Thought Stella Artois took a while to brew? You should see the time it takes to pour. When you brew a beer as perfect as Stella Artois, you're going to be just a bit picky about how it is served. Which is why we like bartenders to follow a carefully organized ritual when they pour it. This includes everything from rinsing the glass, to cutting the excess foam from the head. And even making sure the logo on the coaster and chalice are turned to face the customer. Which might sound fussy to you. But then we're fussy about everything when it comes to our beer.

REVIEW

SEA IT TO BELIEVE IT

Neptune Oyster goes far beyond the typical North End stop.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY BRIAN SILVERSTEIN

As befits a country surrounded on three sides by water, Italian cuisine has always given a prominent role to seafood. While various restaurants in Boston's North End feature respectable seafood dishes, only two make it the centerpiece of their menus. Like Mare (reviewed in these pages a couple of months ago), Neptune Oyster is a relative newcomer to the neighborhood, having just completed its first year in operation. But despite its youth, Neptune offers some of the most consistent, imaginatively conceived, professionally executed and beautifully presented cuisine in the neighborhood. Young revelers love its kinetic atmosphere; they coexist alongside more mature patrons, who come here to savor the fresh fruits of the sea.

Neptune's tiny storefront contains a large, marble-topped bar seating 16, while small tables with wrought iron pedestals and the same marble tops and red leather banquettes along the opposite wall accommodate another 20. White-tile walls, a white hammered-metal ceiling and tiny-white-tile flooring resemble the décor of Grand Central Station's Oyster Bar and innumerable chic raw-bar bistros in Paris. Large, gleaming mirrors framed in dark wood cover the upper part of the walls, some of them inscribed with the names of oyster varieties and specials of the evening. The mirrors alternate with framed fish posters, one depicting two dozen species of swordfish. Black ceiling fans and white-globe hanging light fixtures and sconces complete the bistro décor. The large, plate-glass window looking out on the street is etched with the name of the restaurant and a trident logo, while the restaurant's glass door adds an Italian note, with the words aperitivi, vino, birra fredda and frutti di mare etched from top to bottom.

In attacking Neptune's small but well constructed menu, I paid particular attention to its namesake delicacy, the oyster, offered in several different forms. Because the raw bar is the focus of much of the action at Neptune, I began my gastronomic exploration with three of the 12 varieties of oysters served on the half shell. Neptune's list began with Wellfleet from the outer Cape and continued through Falmouth to five other Massachusetts sources, then on to Watch Hill in Rhode Island, Wawenauk in Maine, up to Cape Breton in Nova Scotia, and out to the Pacific Coast, concluding with Stellar Bay in British Columbia. The Wellfleet ($2.40 each), described as medium-large with a strong salt start and a sweeter finish, more than met those criteria—plump, impeccably fresh, and swimming in its subtle, distinctive-tasting liquor (the liquid surrounding oysters in their shells) and expertly opened to avoid the slightest fragment of shell. The Falmouth, described as "earthy" with a "brie finish" seemed similar to the Wellfleet, if slightly smaller. I didn't quite see this creature, raised under the sea, as "earthy," and any taste of brie escaped me. Finally, the Wiley Point oysters from Maine were slightly larger, pleasantly briny, plump and juicy. But the menu again failed me, as I completely missed the "hint of mint" promised in Neptune's description. I loved the oysters, notwithstanding the descriptions, which reminded me a little of the literary license that wine critics take with fermented grape juice: "vanilla," "grassy," and so on. That license has never stopped me from enjoying wine, and Neptune's oyster descriptions could not detract from the pure, pristine goodness of those splendid bivalves.

LIQUOR LICENSE beer and wine

Moving along through this lively eatery's oyster repertoire, I ordered the poached oysters ($14). These had been poached in prosecco (slightly sweet Italian sparkling wine) and butter, with a substantial dollop of caviar as a garnish. The nine plump oysters proved as fresh as those served on the half shell, and the butter and wine contributed to the sweetness, with the caviar adding an exotically salty dimension. Fried oysters and artichokes ($12.50) combined five flash-fried, lightly breaded oysters with the same number of tender artichoke hearts, also lightly breaded. The careful frying of both oysters and artichoke hearts had given them a crisp exterior that sealed in the natural goodness of these disparate but compatib delicacies. A trace of fontina cheese and splash of truffle oil added a note of cream richness and savory complexity.

Other appetizers included clam chowd ($7), a conventional seafood starter ren dered unconventionally delicious, thic with clams, firm chunks of potato an crunchy celery. Served hot, its intense fl vor rivaled the best in the city. A decided nonstandard offering, baked polenta ner ($11.50), brought a rich block of moist, fl vorful polenta steeped in octopus ink, ove which had been ladled a ragout of tende braised octopus, roasted tomatoes an breadcrumbs topped with minced parsle Its intriguing flavor and the lingering nu ances of the sauce drove us to request piece of bread (which is not routinely o fered at Neptune) to mop it up. Finall among the appetizers, crab cakes ($14 brought two thick, crab-ric patties, crisp yet moist, serve on slices of country ham an endive, with a lively sauce c mustard, horseradish and sou cream. Only the refrigerato cold temperature of the har flawed this delicious ensemble.

Neptune's main course maintain the high standard se by its appetizers. I started wit an oyster po' boy ($14.50), sandwich of nine fried oyste served with a mountain of ho fresh french fries. Despite th indifferent roll—again, bread i not a distinguishing feature of this restau rant—the oysters, accented by a piquan aioli, proved every bit as delectable in thi format as those served raw, poached o combined with artichokes. Biscuit-cruste monkfish ($22) combined excellent, re silient texture with an enjoyable toppin of homemade biscuits. The accompanyin stewed kale and split-pea broth provide herbaceous flavors that enhanced this es timable dish. Marvelous Japanese accent distinguished the filet of salmon ($24) served with morsels of crisp, pleasantl salty duck, avocado and soy sauce spike with raw ginger. The bright green-pea ten drils served with the salmon provided wel come color, but proved difficult to chew tasting like stemmy watercress.

Filet of salmon with crispy duck, avocado salad and pea tendrils

Roasted halibut ($25), a magnificent, generously large and thick filet of fresh fish, roasted outstanding texture, with firm but moist layers of white flesh flaking off the filet at the touch of a fork. Fresh mint framed its delicate flavor, while a garnish of eggplant, chick peas and roasted garlic cloves provided a robust counterpoint. The jumbo sea scallops ($26.50) fetched the second-highest price on the menu, and they clearly merited the premium. (There was a more expensive bone-in ribeye, but I couldn't pass up Neptune's glorious seafood to try it.) Jumbo accurately described these four behemoths, their satiny texture and sweet flavor providing two delectable meals, one in the restaurant and one gently warmed up at home later. A thick slice of pumpkin bread and maple butter at first seemed to risk excessive sweetness, but balanced by nuggets of meaty, salty pork crackles and a garnish of slender, bright green string beans cooked to perfect al dente texture, the whole combination succeeded splendidly.

Neptune's wine list contained a number of first-rate selections. A Montepulciano rosé, offered by the glass ($7), went well with the robust flavors of the polenta nero and the monkfish and its pleasantly bitter kale garnish, while Les Crustaces ($29), a blend of gewürtztraminer, riesling, pinot gris and muscat produced by Alsacian winery Dopff et Irion, complemented the more subtle oysters and the halibut. Cremant d'Alsace ($36), one of my favorite non-champagne sparklers, delivered its taste of the Alsacian terroir in festive mode. Service at Neptune was mixed: excellent one night, satisfactory another and a little distracted on a third.

The volume in this tiny, hard-surfaced venue can be harsh, but I only encountered a particularly boisterous patron on one visit, and with his departure the noise reduced to a much more tolerable level. At any rate, the minor inconvenience seemed like a small price to pay for the spectacular food and chic setting.

Like many North End restaurants, Neptune doesn't offer dessert. No problem. One Saturday evening when our sweet tooth managed to survive Neptune's generous portions, we retreated, along with throngs of other natives and out-of-town visitors who turn the North End into an adult Disneyland, to the line in front of Modern Pastry for a first-rate, freshly stuffed cannoli. iB

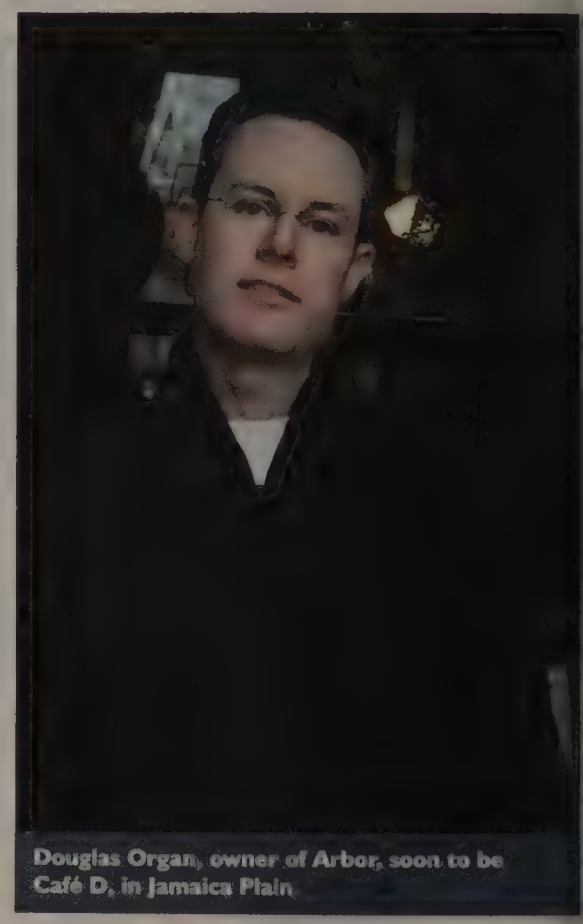
Arbor out on a limb… Vox Populi revamped

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

When Douglas Organ opened Arbor on Centre Street in Jamaica Plain less than two years ago, the diverse neighborhood seemed the perfect spot for an upscale fine-dining restaurant focused on sophisticated Provençal and Mediterranean cuisine. Reviews were universally positive, and the plentiful free parking behind the restaurant made it easy for suburbanites to drive on weekend nights. And yet, says Organ, Arbor wasn't as closely attuned to the neighborhood as he'd wanted it to be. The dark windows and vestibule weren't especially welcoming for walk-ins, and the menu prices—$8-$14 for first courses, $18-$24 for main courses—were too high to entice a high volume of neighborhood diners. So Organ is "re-concepting," closing Arbor after New Year's Eve dinner and then re-opening the restaurant in February as Café D. It will be "a totally new restaurant, basically relaxed and more casual, more suited to the neighborhood," he says. The menu "will change fairly dramatically, downscaling in a pretty big way," with virtually all entrées under $20. As for décor, Organ is installing clear glass windows and knocking out that vestibule, to "bring the restaurant to the street," and doubling the size of the bar. Organ himself is staying on, of course, as is everybody currently on staff.



Douglas Organ, owner of Arbor, soon to be Café D, in Jamaica Plain

SECOND COURSE

Vox Populi is giving us something to talk about: New chef Eric Bogardus, who took over the kitchen in November, is on a mission to bring the quality of the dining experience "up to the level of the bar business," he says. Bogardus is certainly the chef to achieve that goal: With local experience working with Jacky Robert at Locke-Ober, and most recently a six-month stint consulting for a restaurant in Washington, D.C., he's already assembled a new kitchen team and created a full dinner menu. Bogardus had been looking to open his own restaurant in Boston, but real estate was too pricey, and "I wanted to get back into the kitchen before I got rusty!" he laughs. So when owner Joe Quattrocchi offered him the position of executive chef, Bogardus hit the ground running. He hired Greg Di Giovanni, formerly café chef at Maison Robert and former chef at Pierrot Bistrot, as well as other staff and re-trained everybody. He revamped the kitchen, ordering new plates, tables, and dinnerware. And he changed the menu 100 percent. Several dishes will be familiar to diners lucky enough to have enjoyed Bogardus' cooking at Lucy's in Brookline: chickpea polenta fries with red-onion ketchup, date and marrow dumplings with teapot mushroom consommé, ostrich stroganoff, and apple beignets. It's a huge menu, with a half-dozen "small plates," eight appetizers, four pastas and more than 10 main courses, plus side dishes and desserts.

After a stint at Umbra, pastry chef Lee Napoli is back at Sandrine's…In January, Arlington's popular Mexican eatery Zocalo will expand into a larger space on Comm. Ave. (formerly Café Istanbul), featuring added attractions such as a rolling ceviche cart (Boston's first!) and, on weekends, strolling musicians. The Arlington location will stay open. IB

Music: Java Craving

One of the livelier weddings IMPROPER staffers have attended featured an orchestra playing Indonesian gamelan music. So we pricked up our ears when we heard that the MFA is hosting a concert by the Boston Village Gamelan ensemble. Gamelan music, which takes its name from the Javanese word for hammer, is one of the oldest cultural traditions from Central Java. The MFA's collection just happens to include traditional 19th century gamelan instruments—gongs drums, mettalophones and more—and BVG members have been rehearsing on those instruments before small audiences at the MFA since July. Their rehearsals culminate in the January concert, which will include an introductory talk about the art form by Emerson's Andy McGraw. It's all in conjunction with the MFA's exhibition Sounds of the Silk Road: Musical Instruments of Asia. 465 Huntington Ave., Boston (617-369-3308). www.mfa.org. Lecture, 2:30 pm; concert, 3 pm. $24, general admission; $20, museum members; $30 reserved seating for front row; $28, front-row seating for members. —L.P.K.

Film: See It First

The city's annual First Night festivities are a surefire way to start the New Year off right, and thankfully not all First Nig activities involve shivering in the streets. One mellow optio for keeping it inside is the Hynes Convention Center's First Night Film Festival. This year, five screening rooms show sneak previews of forthcoming Hollywood films, new independents and animated shorts. The event kicks off at 12:30 pm with Mad Hot Ballroom, a comical documentary th looks at three groups of 11-year-old New York City public school kids who learn to ballroom dance. The festival continues with The World's Fastest Indian at 2:30 pm, starrin Anthony Hopkins; Ballets Russes at 5 pm; Mutual Appreciati at 7:30 pm; and ends with the rockumentary New York Doll 9:30 pm. Also on the agenda are submissions from the Roxbury Film Festival, Japanese animated films selected by New England Anime Society and a collection of shorts from MassArt's animation program. A First Night button ($15) is all you need for admission. Hynes Convention Center, 900 Boylston St., Boston (617-542-1399). www.firstnight.org. 12 pm–12 am. $15. —L.P.K.

FRI.–SUN. AND TUE./JAN. 5–FEB. 5

Performing Arts: All's Fair in Love and Lust

The movie Cruel Intentions, with Sarah Michelle Gellar, Selma Blair, Reese Witherspoon and hubby Ryan Phillippe, is one of our favorite guilty pleasures. When it comes to portraying love and deceit, that foursome had it mastered. The classic plot, drawn from the 18th-century French novel Les Liaisons Dangereuses by Choderlos de Laclos, can once again be savored—this time on stage—in the Huntington Theatre's production of the play, also based on LaClos' novel. Directed by Daniel Goldstein and written by Christopher Hampton, Les Liaisons Dangereuses is at the Boston University Theatre for one month. Chock full of nudity and "explicit adult situations," this production stars the dishy Michael T. Weiss, who drew attention for his performance in the Huntington's Burn This last season. *264 Huntington Ave., Boston (617-266-0800). www.huntingtontheatre.org. His role with the Red Sox may still be up in the air, but there's no questioning Theo Epstein's commitment to A Foundation To Be Named Later, the charity he started with his twin brother, Paul. On Sunday, Jan. 8, Epstein takes the stage at the Paradise Rock Club, along with a slew of other talented local musicians, for another round of Hot Stove, Cool Music to benefit the Epsteins' foundation and the Jimmy Fund. Red Sox pitchers Bronson Arroyo and Lenny DiNardo, scribe Peter Gammons and rockers like Buffalo Tom, the Gentlemen, Furvis, Juliana Hatfield and Kay Hanley are also slated to perform. As an added bonus to this sixth Hot Stove installment, Epstein, Gammons and Toronto Blue Jays GM J.P. Ricciardi will host a Hot Stove Roundtable discussion at the Paradise on Saturday, Jan. 7, where the three baseball gurus and special guests will dish some inside info on the hottest rumors surrounding the Sox and other teams around baseball. Both events are sponsored by Guinness and THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN. *967 Comm. Ave., Boston (617-423-6398). www.thedise.com. Roundtable, Jan. 7, 1 pm. $100. Tastings: Gone Fishin'

Want to score a little good luck heading into the new year? Improve your prospects for '06 by taking part in the Feast of Seven Fishes, an Italian Christmas Eve tradition said to bring good fortune in the year to come. Th number seven represents the sacraments of Christianity, the seven pilgrimage churches of Rome and the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and while the specifics of the can feast vary, the only rule is that seven fish mu be presented throughout the course of the meal. Fret not, however, about that poaching and fileting: We've found two local eateries offering up versions of the feast. In Beacon Hill, Grotto chef/owner Scott Herritt prepares four fish-laden courses and a dessert course, as well as a limited menu featuring items from the feast, signature dishes and new inspirations that can be ordered as a prix-fixe meal (three courses for $40 or four course for $50). The same night, Davio's Boston chefs Stephen Brown, Eric Swart and Rodney Murillo put together a five-course dinner featuring seven sea creatures, including clams, calamari, scallops and shrimp. ng Lee's "gay cowboy movie" turns out to be more motional and less sensational than you might ex- ct. It's a 20-plus-year tale of two young cowboys leath Ledger, Jake Gyllenhaal) put together on a mmer ranching job in 1963, who fall for each her despite saying they're "not queer." As each re- rns to his separate life, eventually involving an satisfying marriage for each man, they reconnect a secret relationship during "fishing trips" to- ther on the mountain where they once herded eep. Whenever the opportunity arises to live to- ther and start a ranch over the next 20 years, one's r of being found out thwarts the relationship from ing further. The end result is a sad tale of frustra- n, self-censorship and a life together that never s, intimately told, with no villains beyond those seen societal forces inhibiting the two men. dger's performance as the close-mouthed cowpoke see most can be mannered, but the earthy re- aint of the movie—in its staging and its tight cus on its characters—adds to its effectively lancholy mood. uman Capote revolutionized pop culture with his 65 "nonfiction novel" In Cold Blood. Without it, might not have had subsequent books like The rfect Storm or A Civil Action, nor film documen- ies like the Maysles Brothers' Salesman and the le- n of movies it inspired. This impressionistic ma about the long genesis of the book follows pote (Philip Seymour Hoffman) as he learns of a tal Kansas farmhouse murder and sees human ma where others might've seen only savagery. t in unearthing the humanity in the killers, pote becomes torn apart by the dilemma of ini- lly wanting to help them and, after years of ap- ls, wanting them to finally be executed so he can sh the book. There's a fine line between Capote's yful way of performing at parties and the white with which he manipulates Perry Smith (Clifton llins Jr.), the killer with whom he bonds most ply. Hoffman immerses himself in the role of the ter who's both mousy and catty, and the movie ely gives its protagonist a matter-of-fact intro- tion that makes it easy for audiences to accept ffman as Capote. re's passion dripping from George Clooney's Os tale—for journalism, for liberty, for movie- ing. Filmed in an evocative, cigarette-smoke- d black-and-white, his second movie as direc- chronicles the decision by CBS TV's nonsense star journalist, Edward R. Murrow id Strathairn), to take on Senator Joseph Mc- hy, the Communist-hunting bully. Murrow's ir bravery helps turn the tide against Mc- hy, and beneath the tense story of dilemmas decisions—told in a vibrant style in which the era often seems to "find" the action, documen- style—are the issues of the role of journalism the larger matter of what it means to be an rican. Clooney sets the tone for the movie by aking the lead role. Instead, he plays Murrow's ucer, Fred Friendly. Similarly, the movie does- grandstand or go for "big moments," and hairn not only catches Murrow's distinctively ed cadence, he also lets that cadence suggest noral precision that defines the character, as as the movie. The World's a Stage

Pluto and The Producers get flamboyant.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

If the characters in Susan Stroman's The Producers and Neil Jordan's Breakfast on Pluto act as if they've just stepped off a stage, it's no accident. The first is the movie of the stage musical of Mel Brooks's 1968 comedy classic, while the second soars on the personality of its protagonist, an Irish transvestite who lives as if he's performing in a theatrical struggle against the world around him.

The Producers (1968) contained a musical within a movie. The 2001 stage show turned it into a full-blown musical. Besides having a very mixed reaction to The Producers' stage musical, which I saw during its local stop three years ago, I couldn't recall exactly what I did and didn't like about it. The movie brought it all back, though, and it's abundantly clear what works and what's less appealing about the musical version.

If you've seen the 1968 original—and if you haven't, you should—it's hard to get excited about how in the movie musical, the two main characters' initial 15 minutes together is almost a word-for-word re-creation of scenes from the original (Brooks wrote and directed the original; he co-wrote the script and songs in the musical). That's when high-strung accountant Leo Bloom (Matthew Broderick) arrives at the office of boisterous, on-the-skids Broadway producer Max Bialystock (Nathan Lane). It's also when you realize Lane and Broderick aren't just repeating some of the best dialogue from the original, they're essentially imitating that movie's priceless performances by Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder as, respectively, Bialystock and Bloom.

Lane captures Mostel and his oversized comic persona more amusingly than stiff Broderick does Wilder. The premise of the story begins when Bloom innocently observes that a producer could make more money with a flop than a hit, by overfinancing a bad play and then absconding with the leftover budget after it flops. Bialystock convinces Bloom to partner with him and turn the theory into reality, leading the pair to hire the world's worst playwright (Will Ferrell's unreformed Nazi Franz Liebkind) and the world's worst director (Gary Beach's cross-dressing Roger DeBris) to stage the self-described "musical romp" Springtime for Hitler.

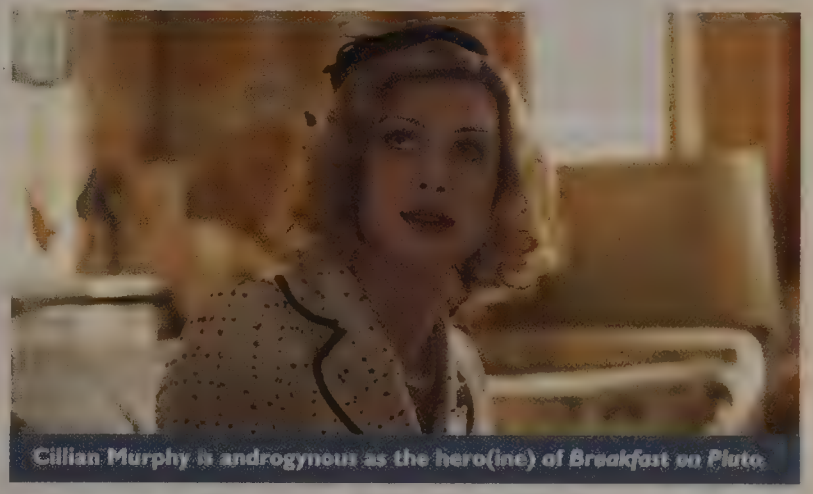
Although Lane has his moments, especially the lively song "Betrayed," as he and Broderick channel the original's stars, it's Beach and Roger Bart (as Roger's catty assistant, Carmen Ghia), with roles expanded from the original, who steal the movie. Beach's facial expressions are hilarious but, like the stage musical, the movie (also featuring Uma Thurman as Bialystock and Bloom's athletic secretary) still yields just mixed marks. The original has more laughs, despite being 45 minutes shorter, and already had three memorable songs in it (one not in the movie musical).

Breakfast on Pluto is also long and full of music, and its cross-dresser takes center stage. He's Patrick "Kitten" Brady (Cillian Murphy), an Irish orphan whose birth mother leaves him on a church rectory's doorstep in the late 1950s, inadvertently setting him on a picaresque journey through the 1960s and 1970s. It's a journey involving a disgruntled foster mother (Ruth McCabe), an unorthodox priest (Liam Neeson), the IRA, a biker (Liam Cunningham), a glam-rock singer (Gavin Friday), a magician (Stephen Rea) and his elusive birth mother (Eva Birthistle), among others.

Although the presence of a cross-dresser in a Neil Jordan movie inevitably recalls his 1993 hit The Crying Game, Breakfast on Pluto is more a cousin to Jordan's feral The Butcher Boy, another of his best. Like that 1997 black comedy, Breakfast on Pluto is based on a Patrick McCabe novel, and the author has again collaborated with Jordan on a rousing screenplay. This film similarly has a headstrong, charismatic hero prone to referring to himself in the third person and staging grand psychological battles to overcome those who would marginalize him.

He usually wins over such people and we're in his corner all the way, thanks to the performance of Murphy (28 Days Later, Batman Begins), who shows more onscreen personality here than I ever thought he could muster. With a twinkle in his eye and a bounce in his walk, Murphy gives Kitten a beaming resilience that allows the character to overcome those who want to take advantage of him and glean important lessons from those he befriends. (Conor McEvoy, who plays the hero as a 10-year-old, also deserves credit for filling the boy with personality before Murphy takes over the role as a teen.)

Sometimes those life lessons come from unexpected places, like the biker who tells teenaged Kitten the fanciful story of a motorcycle ride that goes from the past to the future and ends with breakfast on Pluto. It's a tribute to individualism and finding your own path that Kitten takes to heart and, like The Butcher Boy, Breakfast on Pluto has great affection for individuals, but trouble with people in organized groups, whether it's the IRA, the Catholic Church or any other group that might stifle individual expression.



Cillian Murphy is androgynous as the hero(ine) of Breakfast on Pluto

So it's not surprising that the storytelling in Breakfast on Pluto comes purely from Kitten's point of view. His window to the world is often through music, and the movie gets great mileage from 1960s-1970s Anglo-American Top-40 like Harry Nilsson's "Me and My Arrow," T. Rex's "Children of the Revolution" and Sweet's "Wig Wam Bam." It even squeezes drama from Bobby Goldsboro's syrupy "Honey," clearly the best cinematic use of a goofy pop song since "Tiny Dancer" in Almost Famous. IB

Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire ★★

Four entries into the series, these movies are still little more than bloated, big-budget versions of lame 1980s post-E.T. kids' movies like Young Sherlock Holmes. Our hero (Daniel Radcliffe) is still a drip. His friends (Emma Watson, Rupert Grint) are still twee losers. The quaint tone is still annoying. The movie is still an elephants' graveyard for English actors. And HP4 is as long and almost as plodding as its predecessors. As usual, there's little flow in the latest, directed by Mike Newell (Donnie Brasco), which follows Harry as he competes in a Tri-Wizard competition against three other wiz kids. Scenes run too long for fear of leaving something out and alienating fans of the book, and the resulting sequences rarely flow into each other, making the movie very episodic. It's almost comical how it asks you again and again to marvel at magic/special-effects (cue the reaction shots of wide-eyed kids), but the end result is that none of the magic seems special, due to the sheer abundance of it. Radcliffe, Watson and Grint are at least finally starting to look semi-comfortable onscreen, and newcomers-to-the-series Brendan Gleeson and Miranda Richardson add a few laughs, but the adolescent drama mixed in between the competition is as by-the-numbers as a run-of-the-mill Afterschool Special. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Ice Harvest ★★

John Cusack's wounded cynicism, Billy Bob Thornton's hot temper, Oliver Platt's comic timing and Connie Nielsen's gams and deadpan flippancy certainly elevate Harold Ramis' latest. But they can't disguise the fact that it's a generic heist comedy full of scoundrels we're told little about and whose dirty deeds we're given little reason to care about. It's hard to even fathom exactly what's going on at times in this story of a Wichita mob lawyer (Cusack) and pornographer (Thornton) who steal a bundle from a Midwest mob boss (an underutilized Randy Quaid) on Christmas Eve, and who try to make it through a long night of freezing rain before they can get out of town. We're never shown the two thieves doing their jobs or their extracurricular skimming, so you just have to accept what the movie tells you about them and their scheme. So scenes of comic amorality are often funny, as characters backs one another, but they don't really add up to t much due to the lack of context. As the misera friend who married the lawyer's ex-wife and is dy for something more exciting out of life, Platt st the movie, because we actually get to see the fan and in-laws he can't stand, and we commiser with him. With the others, most everythin sketchy, which makes the movie mildly amusing instantly forgettable. (At Boston Common, Fenv Kendall Square and suburbs.)

Sam Mendes' adaptation of former Marine sni Anthony Swofford's book about his experiences ing the first Gulf War has narrowed the focus of story so much that it loses a lot from page to scre By dropping the background about Swofford bulked-up Jake Gyllenhaal), who's foolishly lowed in the path of his miserable ex-Marine dad well as the flash-forwards to his post-war encoun with his comrades (who, like him, aren't doing well), the movie becomes more about the war th the people fighting it. But as a movie chronicl the absurdity of the Gulf War, aka "The Me War"—with Swofford's platoon waiting in the C for six months for the war to begin and then see frustratingly little action—this runs a distant sec to 1999's more inventive Three Kings. Strippe Swofford's tangents, it's rendered fairly conv tional: You have the scared, confused foot soldi (with Peter Sarsgaard and Lucas Black also am the cast), the hard-working staff sergeant (Jar Foxx) and the oblivious senior officer who ca only about his power (Dennis Haysbert). Wh here is decent, but it might have been less gene had it dared to be more adventurous. (At Bost Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

ry once in a while, director Stephen Frears (The fters, Dirty Pretty Things) lays a generic egg. Al-ugh it sounds racy and its pulchritude is scenic at es, it's more in line with quaint English comedies 2003's Calendar Girls than with Showgirls. In er words, it's all very tasteful and the comedy lly verges on the cute. The story is never actu-bad, it's just never very interesting—the charac-are one-dimensional and because they never pen, everything remains shallow, especially the eated bickering between Mrs. H and her theater nager.

Saving Private Ryan, Steven Spielberg opened n a horrific battle sequence, and then spent the rest of the movie trying to convince you the ideals of World War II justified all that carnage. His latest takes a more somber approach to the effects of violence, especially on those who inflict it. Eric Bana stars as an Israeli soldier who, following the kidnapping and murder of 11 Israeli athletes and coaches at the 1972 summer games in Munich, is recruited to head a covert squad designed to find and assassinate the Palestinians who planned the Olympic Village attack. The early action feels odd, as it has you rooting for the team (also including characters played by Daniel Craig and Ciaran Hinds) to kill people—especially since the action withholds most of the Olympic violence until later flashbacks. Still, the movie functions as a well-oiled, globetrotting thriller full of nail-biting sequences, and the movie's sense of right and wrong, good and bad, isn't as fixed as it initially seems. As the squad leader gets deeper into the shadow world in which any ally might be an enemy, and in which helpful friends might have hidden agendas that aren't very friendly, he begins to question the value of fighting violence with violence. Does his violence just create more enemies? Does it really make him safer from attack? Whether this is meant as a commentary on the current "war on terror" is debatable, but it's certainly food for thought. Aside from one very dubious piece of editing—in which Spielberg intercuts the final flashback of Olympic tragedy with a sex scene—this is solid, thoughtful stuff from Spielberg, a step up from last summer's War of the Worlds. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Sarah Silverman: Jesus is Magic ★★★

New Hampshire native Silverman—a veteran of The Larry Sanders Show, Saturday Night Live (briefly), Mr. Show with Bob and David and just about everything on the Comedy Central schedule—was responsible for one of the more memorable comic riffs in this year's long-running comedy documentary The Aristocrats. She gets an entire movie to herself this time. Her performance film, directed by Liam Lynch (who also directs the upcoming Tenacious D movie), essentially has a cable stand-up-special format, with a story frame at the beginning and end, and a few cut-away scenes in the middle of her stand-up act, as well as a few songs. Recalling both Andy Kaufman and Lenny Bruce in her comic approach, Silverman is not afraid to make her audience feel uncomfortable (like Kaufman) or to challenge its preconceptions about other people (like Bruce). In Silverman's case, much of that is accomplished by playing her girlish, attractive looks against the brash things she says. The oft-quoted "I was raped by a doctor, which is so bittersweet for a Jewish girl" is one of her better lines, and her humor often looks at the tribes into which we divide ourselves. Not all of the songs or cut-aways work (a backstage skit with Bob Odenkirk goes nowhere), and the whole movie runs only 72 minutes, but Silverman's comedy scores much more often than not. (At Kendall Square.)

Syriana ★★★

Traffic writer Stephen Gaghan makes his debut as writer-director in this drama that essentially takes the same approach to the oil business as the earlier movie did to the drug trade—by looking at the intersection of business, politics and crime. There are a wide variety of characters and locations here, and through much of the first hour you pine for a scorecard to keep everyone and everything straight in your head: There's a CIA field agent (George Clooney) popping back and forth between Washington and the Middle East, a Saudi-like emirate full of palace intrigue, two Texas oil companies trying to merge, a D.C. lawyer (Jeffrey Wright) the oil companies hire to fend off the Department of Justice, an expatriate American energy analyst (Matt Damon) who becomes an adviser to the more progressive prince of the emirate (Alexander Siddig), and a Pakistani immigrant (Mazhar Munir) who loses his oil-refinery job in the Persian Gulf because of all the boardroom machinations. Despite the sheer complexity of the early going, the story comes together very potently in its second half, with a particularly chilling climax. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Transamerica ★★

It's great to see Felicity Huffman of TV's late, great Sports Night (and now Desperate Housewives) get center stage in a movie, playing the pre-op male transsexual hero(ine) in this road movie. But, despite her convincing performance as a highly-strung, deeply sad man preparing for an imminent sex change, it's clear early on that first-time writer-director Duncan Tucker is going to keep the tale on a merely pleasant, surprisingly bland keel (it's even blander when weighed against the similarly gender-bending Breakfast on Pluto). Huffman's Stanley "Bree" Osbourne discovers he has a teen son he never knew he had, and his shrink (Elizabeth Pena) requires him to go see this new relative (Kevin Zegers) before she'll sign off on the sex change. But all Tucker can concoct for these two is predictable tension as the strangers road-trip from New York to Los Angeles before their inevitable bonding, and sitcom-style hysterics when, after car trouble, the pair reluctantly stop at her estranged parents' house in Phoenix. Most of all, Tucker's movie seems like a pale version of The Station Agent, which was a more vivid, amusing and heartfelt peek at outsider characters. (At Kendall Square.)

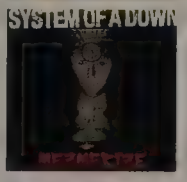
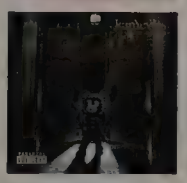
Sights and Sounds

A year in review: 2006's top CDs and concert DVDs

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

This is the season for year-end lists and last-minute holiday gifts. Here are my annual picks for CDs and concert DVDs, though the lines between categories are blurring as record labels bundle stuff to provide more (un-downloadable) bang for the buck. The CD list favors my critical choices of 2005, while my DVD recommendations lean to popular entries.





CDs

Beck, Guero (Interscope). The postmodern collage kid's best mash-up since Odelay, refining that 1996 CD's junkyard bounce with the maturity of 2002's melancholic Sea Change.

My Morning Jacket, Z (ATO). Kentucky's alt-country rockers transcend reverb to explore post-Radiohead sonic frontiers.

M.I.A., Arular (Beggars Banquet/XL). Bubblegum bombs from a London-based Sri Lankan refugee whose pointed street slang and computer-savvy beats rule the Top 40 in an alternate universe.

System of a Down, Mezmerize (American/Columbia). Art-metal anarchists create acerbic, absurdist juxtapositions; neatly folds into follow-up disc Hypnotize to form a double album.

Kanye West, Late Registration (Roc-A-Fella). Hitting higher highs than on his debut The College Dropout, rapper West stays a step ahead of the class as a cunning, cocky conceptualist.

Charles Lloyd, Jumping the Creek (ECM). Stellar jazz from a sax icon whose music is meditative, mercurial and full of ideas, with an empathetic quartet led by pianist Geri Allen.

Sarah Lee Guthrie & Johnny Irion, Exploration (New West). The granddaughter of Woody Guthrie and her Carolina indie-rock husband overlap in beautiful harmonies on their first release together, deftly bridging country and folk-rock.

Damian "Jr. Gong" Marley, Welcome to Jamrock (Tuff Gong/Universal). The youngest son of father Bob rises to the forefront of reggae's first family with an incendiary blend of dancehall and roots reggae sweetened with hip-hop.

Sufjan Stevens, Illinois (Asthmatic Kitty). This indie-rock curio—the second entry in an ambitious salute to the 50 states—riffs on Casimir Pulanski Day, Carl Sandburg and Abraham Lincoln to eclectic orchestration that suggests someone who frequented the band room after history class.

Amadou & Mariam, Dimanche à Bamako (Nonesuch). Afro-pop from a blind Malian couple that taps into diverse cultural references from blues-rock to Latin American dance music, with extra spice from polyglot producer/stylist Manu Chao.

Concert DVDs

Cream, Royal Albert Hall (Rhino). An excellent alternative to traveling to London or New York and paying hundreds to witness the original power trio's first shows in 37 years. Blustery bassist Jack Bruce and dream drummer Ginger Baker get as much focus as smooth guitar idol Eric Clapton.

Pixies, Sell Out 2004 Reunion Tour (Rhino). Another hell-freezes-over reunion logs miles and smiles (well, maybe not from dour singer Frank Black). Boston's alt-godfathers were better in the studio, but they're stronger onstage now than ever. A full set from France, plus better-shot selections from other locations, including Lowell's Tsongas Arena.

Various Artists, Live 8 (Capitol). From TV to DVD a lot faster than 1985's Live Aid, these four discs boast more than 70 acts, from U2 and Paul McCartney (together) to a climactic Pink Floyd reconciliation with Roger Waters.

U2, Vertigo 2005: Live from Chicago (Interscope). These post-elevated superstars really don't need another live DVD, but this one vies with the best, thanks to invigorating camerawork (from overhead to the pit) and early rarities.

Green Day, Bullet in a Bible (Reprise). Once-snotty punks turn into potent, important rock stars for a stadium-sized English crowd, members of whom pay homage in an insightful between-song interview segment worth laying off the skip button. The same songs come packaged on a live CD.

Bruce Springsteen & the E Street Band, Hammersmith Odeon, London 1975 (Columbia). One vintage night before the Boss shaved and soared to stardom, serving as the first disc of a reissued Born to Run box. The funky brimmed hats in the E Street wardrobe are outdated, but classics like "Kitty's Back" and "Jungleland" show the future of rock 'n' roll.

Various artists, Live From Bonnaroo 2004 (Sanctuary). Artfully filmed by photographer Danny Clinch, this sampler from the showcase festival for jambands is as enlightening for songs from raucous rockers Kings of Leon and My Morning Jacket as those from standbys moe. and Trey Anastasio.

Franz Ferdinand (Domino). An early step for a live DVD from Scotland's pop sensations, but their slash 'n' hop attack is primed for the stage. More than two complete shows makes a generous but overlapping set aided by snappy navigation.

Rush, R30 (Anthem/Zoe). Canada's own futuristic power trio raids the vaults for rare performances and interviews in addition to a concert from its 30th anniversary tour.

The Dresden Dolls, Paradise (Roadrunner). The camera loves Boston's dynamic, decadent cabaret-punk duo—especially through the eyes of filmmaker Michael Pope, who nailed 10 songs at the Paradise as well as two wild bonus videos. IB ut with 2005 and in with 2006...I ried, I really did. I did the match hing, volunteered, attended school, ent to the gym, talked politics and ven went on hospital visits. Not one pecial invite came into my life....I id hello, I smiled, made small nversations, but still no prince to e found. I can't figure out where the ice, single 40-55 guys are. I've been there, done that" with the bar ene and have grown old and can't e bothered. On the plus side, I'll ve money not having to buy gifts, ut how I'd love to have that special meone for talks, walks or even a g or two. How I'd love to splurge n you! Tall, blonde, blue eyes, not orexic thin, not obese, shy yet tgoing. My boobs are mine and so the cellulite, but I guess that's not ough. I don't want pity; I just want prince. Every woman dreams of the y when she'll meet her prince. opefully 2006 will bring one. And if not, I have full control of the TV remote for another year! Here's to a happy and healthy 2006!

In Bad, Bad Company

On Oct. 28, I received a $15 ticket for street sweeping on Yeamans Street by the Revere post office. I live 30 miles south of Revere and had no idea that street sweeping day is the last Monday of the season. I went to the Parking Clerk's office to dispute it and they set up a hearing for the following day. They told me it was a quick process—yeah right! Because my name begins with a "w," I had to be there over an hour before I finally got my turn. Since I drive a cab in Revere, I was told I should've known the parking rules and regulations of the city, so my ticket was valid. FYI: Revere doesn't require a written test of rules and regulations of the city to obtain a hackney license like Boston does. If this so-called intelligent person's going to make a statement like that, he should have facts to back up his information. Meanwhile, he let an elderly woman out of a $50 fire lane violation, a young lady out of a fire zone violation and a man from Everett out of the SAME street sweeping violation, because, as he said to the Everett resident, "I can't expect you to know abut the street sweeping zones if you're from Everett." If everyone were held accountable for his or her violations, I would have no problem with this ignoramus, but he just picks and chooses! I've never met such an unfair, totally biased, unjust, prejudiced individual who thinks he's God, perfect and never wrong. The only other people like that are Mussolini, Hitler, Hussein and Bin Laden.

I Love Canada

I'm hunting for a Canadian boy! You were on the D Green Line train the other day with a Canada scarf, a long grey coat and nice shoes. I was the cute blonde with the greenish coat and wool skirt whose boot you stepped on. I was going to get angry since it was one of those days, but you bent down to brush it off and winked at me. Who winks nowadays? How cute were you? Your hair said hockey and your smile and blue eyes made it sexy, but it was your cute accent that caught my attention. I feel silly now for not starting a conversation, but you ended up chatting with the girl standing next to you. I've thought about you since then and how refreshing it was to bump into a sweet, polite and good-looking guy. If this story sounds familiar, send an e-mail to: bostoncanadian@gmail.com, and maybe we can grab a drink and play in the snow, eh!

Is it Fate or Art?

Remember when you began talking to me one night in Newbury Comics in Cambridge in early September? I was looking through the comic book section and you asked me what I was looking for. I was the girl who wanted Eightball by Daniel Clowes and then it led me to go off on a tangent about how I related to Ghost World and how I'm a young girl in the city.

Then about two months later we made eyes again at the Museum of Fine Arts store in early November. You smiled at me and I met your gaze with some confusion, but then quickly realized where I'd seen you. It was some strange moment straight out of a movie. I wish I'd said something to you that day. If I never see you again, I'll have to add that to the top of my list of regrets. I haven't stopped thinking about you since. I want to know you because there must be a reason why we ended up in the same place at the same time twice.

Pick Me Up Before You Go Go

I'm sending my warmest, heartfelt thanks to the wonderful man with the pickup truck who pulled me out of a snow bank. My car skidded on some ice on the way to work and I came quite close to crashing into a tree. Luckily I missed it, but got stuck in all that damn snow. A knight in shining armor just happened to drive by, saw how desperate I was, and pulled my car out without hesitation. A million thanks and all the best to you. Have a wonderful holiday!
—Eternally Grateful

Habla Amor?

Betsy, it was Dec. 5 on the Fitchburg train when I asked you about the next train station with my poor English. I remember your eyes but my limited English wasn't enough to ask you for your phone number or out for coffee. I'd love to contact you and send you my address whenever you take a trip to Spain. E-mail me.

rockie horoscope

DECEMBER 21, 2005–JANUARY 10, 2006 BY ROCKIE GARDINER

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Archers born in mid-December often have natal planets in Capricorn, so their birthday mind-set will continue through Christmas and, thanks to late Hanukkah and Kwanzaa celebrations, beyond. The others can make the most of clever Mercury coming back to early Sagittarius, speeding up their thought processes and punctuating their conversations with wisdom and wit. But try to refrain from playing the fool, a practice you're apt to resort to when your Jupiter ruler is threatened by muscle-bound Mars and stony-faced Saturn.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

No one who is as committed to family as a Capricorn wants to hear that, while your tradition-bound Saturn ruler is being provoked by trouble-making Mars, the holidays might not live up to your expectations. On the other hand, you could be spurred on to do more to brighten up the house or spend more on the people who live there. Remember, Saturn hasn't been in luxurious Leo for almost 30 years. For many this could be your first experience of living really well in the material world. Time to lavish expensive gifts on loved ones (along with the people you need to impress).

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

If you love them, let them go; if it's meant to be, they'll come back to you. This well-worn bit of advice could become your mantra for the holiday season. Although affectionate Venus has only been in Aquarius since the full moon, it's already preparing to turn retrograde on Christmas Eve and return to Capricorn by New Year's Day. Therefore you don't have much time to make an indelible impression on someone before the love goddess slips out of your grasp. But Venus returns to Aquarius on Feb. 3. Even if it seems premature, think about plans for Valentine's Day.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

The holiday season is hardly the time for a major dispute, but while demanding Mars and nay-saying Saturn refuse to budge from their iron-clad positions, you could catch more incidental flak than a well-meaning Fish should. Wishing for peace and good will may not be your primary objective this Christmas, but pissing off your nearest and dearest, even if they seem to be more hard-hearted than usual, certainly isn't. Where's the love? Look to casual friends and folks with mutual interests for a good, guilt-free time.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Besides celebrating the coming of the sun, the winter solstice also marks the progress you've made since the spring equinox and your birthday. Because Capricorn governs your mid-heaven, current career concerns will probably be what matters the most. However, you can't ignore the ongoing tug-of-war between impulsive Mars, your cut-to-the-chase ruling planet, and philosophical, consider-the-big-picture Jupiter. Don't be surprised if an authority figure, e.g., the landlord or Grandma, decides to take sides.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

Boys rule! You're in for a decidedly masculine couple of weeks as macho Mars in Taurus challenges both paternal Saturn and avuncular Jupiter before settling into a productive, probably athletic as well, New Year's weekend. After circumventing restrictions and confronting the voice of experience, you'll be ready to begin an adventure of your own making. Like a committed crusader, you're willing to go to battle for your beliefs, not to mention for bragging rights and the opportunity to grow wealthy and wise. In this situation, your gentle, genteel Venus ruler seems missing in action.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

There's something inexplicably sexy about the winter solstice, especially since it occurs in your house of partners, so get inspired by the interests and resources you have in common. Whether you curl up by the fire, dive under the covers or drive out to the beach, make the occasion that the sun enters Capricorn magical for you both. Coincidentally, your Mercury ruler in your Sagittarius house of allies is about to expose you to an unusual, unexpected experience as well as a possible job offer. Good stuff for the holidays. Enjoy.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Moon children can practically feel their temperatures rise as the sun prepares to enter Capricorn and celebrate the coming of the light. Every solstice holds the promise of change; the winter solstice in the northern hemisphere indicates that the days will soon get longer and, in six short months, that summer and your birthday will be here. But for now, your heart and soul are drawn to significant others the affection and concern you have for them and the impact they have on you. It may be only seasonal, but it's what is.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Every sign of the zodiac that your sun ruler travels through has an influence on how you feel and what commands your attention. And while the equinoxes might restore your equilibrium, it's the solstices that have the most profound effect. Summer and Cancer can brighten your disposition and warm your heart, but it's winter and Capricorn that provide the solitude your soul needs to survive. This is especially true for the year ahead; restrictive Saturn in Leo can pile responsibilities on you that you're neither prepared nor willing to assume. It's called growing up.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

The holidays could be hot for you this year. The more planets there are in hospitable earth signs, the greater the attention you receive—particularly since affectionate Venus and passionate Mars are coming on to each other. Add the creativity of the Capricorn sun in your house of romance and recreation, and even a modest, self-deprecating Virgin should be able to read the writing on the wall. So what's the catch? Ah, the expense of it all! Although it might not cost a fortune, be prepared to pay if you want to play.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Experiencing more false starts than usual? Blame your Venus ruler for shifting gears as she moves from pragmatic Capricorn to idealistic Aquarius and then, smack in the middle of last-minute Xmas shopping, turns retrograde. So the week before New Year's might seem as familiar as the week before Christmas: the same cast of characters, the same stuff only headed in the opposite direction. Until Feb. 3, when the goddess faces forward again, you'll have time and reasons to re-evaluate relationship and family issues.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Why a financial transaction with a neighbor shows up as a crucial ingredient in this holiday season is a mystery only Scorpio could solve. Does someone have tickets to scalp? Is there a joint yard sale in the offing? Now is also a good time to pursue a romantic relationship; although you may have had to back off while your Mars co-ruler was retrograde, the planet of passion is ready to turn up the heat. Ergo, so should you. Since Mars won't stay in your Taurus marriage house much past Valentine's Day, carpe diem.

HOLIDAY SALE, $5 OFF. To order a personalized Transit Forecast (30 to 40+ pages) detailing the major themes and issues that will arise over the next 12 months. LAST SCENE HERE

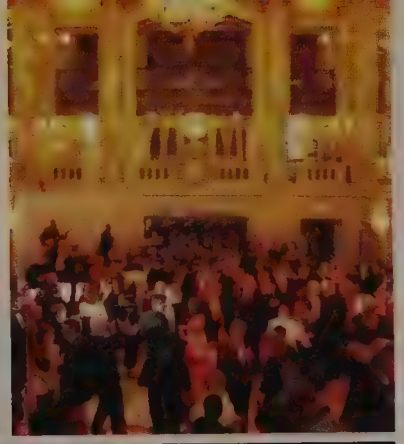
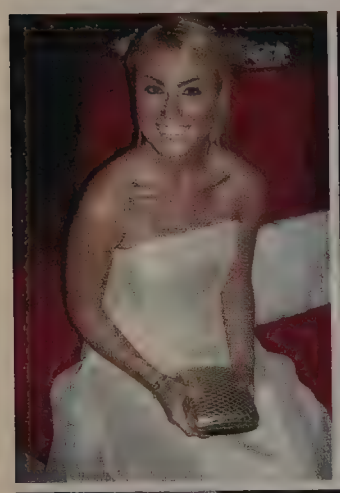
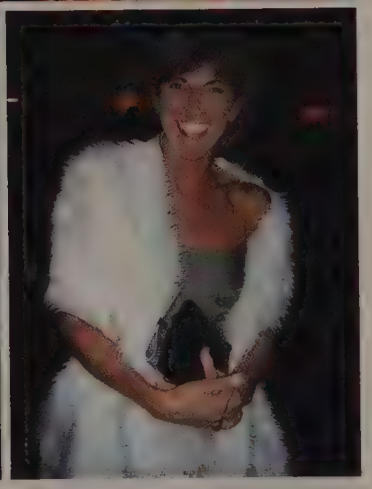
BY JONATHAN SOROFF







At the Silver Jubilee Gala, top row: The party. Middle row: Lily Poduska; Coco Grace; Lynn Kortenhaus wearing a tablecloth. Bottom row: Sickly sweet candy cane cocktail

SO MISTLETOE REALLY IS AN APHRODISIAC...

The Wang Center's Silver Jubilee Gala was a bit like a glass of eggnog spiked with cognac: fun and fattening, with more than a dash of holiday schmaltz.

The super-swanky black-tie affair (at $1,000 a head, certainly one of the bigger-ticket fund-raisers of the holiday season) began with jazz and cocktails in the lobby (the specialty drink, garnished with a candy cane, "tasted like Pepto-Bismol and Scope," according to one guest) and continued with a sumptuous dinner at tables that transformed the theater into a glittering Winter Wonderland.

On-hand for the festivities: Lorraine Wang (widow of the high-tech billionaire and benefactor), the organization's jefe Joe Spaulding, with both his beautiful bride, Joyce, and mother, noted philanthropist, adventurer and North Shore grande dame Helen (one of Jackie Kennedy's bridesmaids), über-arts patrons Bill and Susan Poduska with their gorgeous daughter, Lily, ubiquitous party pair Smoki Bacon and Dick Concannon, power couple Carol and Bernie Fulp, the lovely Mary Wolfson with Bob Rosenberg (aka Mr. Dunkin' Donuts), latter-day Nick and Nora Charles Kevin and Maggie Ahearn, the statuesque Allison Bibbins Ward (looking stunning in Armani), New Hampshire governor John Lynch, Boston Lyric Opera head honcho Janice Mancini DelSesto, Commonwealth Shakespeare Company grand poobah Steven Maler, Boston's answer to Santa Claus, Ted Cutler, with the dazzling Joan, stunning young things Jeff and Christine McCormick, the perfectly lovely Kay and Peter Lyons and PR czarina Lynn Kortenhaus (who caught a chill in her sexy, strapless gown from Akris, and after dinner resourcefully grabbed one of the fuzzy tablecloths to use as a wrap).

Once everyone was well-fed and well-lubricated, they were ushered into the theater to watch a dress rehearsal of Irving Berlin's White Christmas ("The reason I've been popping Zantac 75 like it's candy," quipped Spaulding), which got everyone into the holiday spirit.

Apparently, it also put some guests in the mood for love, like one man who said, "I tried to convince my wife to christen the mezzanine with me during intermission, but no go," to which someone else responded, "We've already done it." Meanwhile, someone else obviously got a bit naughty—according to one woman: "I was waiting for a stall in the ladies room, and when the person came out, she said, 'That's not my bra hanging on the door.' Sure enough, there was a big black strapless bra in there."

BLING A DING DING...

The dress code was diamonds and leather when Shreve, Crump and Low threw a rock 'n' roll blowout to celebrate the relocation of their flagship store to the corner of Boylston and Berkeley streets.

A fund-raiser for Berklee City Music and the Music and Youth Initiative, the party attracted the likes of the store's new owners, Ann and Maria Birks, party planner extraordinaire Bryan Rafanelli (whose new line of table decorations is on sale upstairs), gorgeous newlyweds Lisa and Steve Woolfson, Polish fashion plate Kasia Nelson, blonde bombshell Darlene Jordan with her high school chum Georgia Critsley, kabuki socialite Marilyn Riseman, party pair Frances and Bud Moseley, the delectable Trish Fuller, Concord socialites Cat and Rob Mast an Drew and Kim Picullel, restaurateur Set Woods and his stunning wife, Megan, an countless, equally sparkly others.

Arriving guests were handed gift card that ranged in value from $50-$1,00 (one woman whose card was only wort $250 whined, "The watch I like $27,000"), but the highlight of th evening was undoubtedly when Aero smith bassist Tom Hamilton joined th band of Berklee students for back-up o "Walk This Way."

Meanwhile, among the party's witties remarks: the guest who greeted the dra duo The Hat Sisters with, "I almo wore that. Thank God I changed before left the house," and the complimen "You've still got an Anguillan tan" elici ing the response, "I've still got an Angui lan hangover."

HOW MUCH IS THAT TRIPTYCH IN THE WINDOW?

Forget that it was still November; th opening night of the December Sale the School of the Museum of Fin Arts drew a crowd of savvy arts patron that included Nashville-born thorough bred Trevania Henderson, the mind bogglingly beautiful Mary Jean Keane impish decorator Ken Dietz, connoisseu and collector Allison Sallke, restaurate Darryl Settles, MFA curator Frederic Ilchman and Beacon Hill babe Meg Go don, to name a mere handful.

Summing things up succinctly, one gue said, "I don't have a square inch of spa on my walls," to which one volunteer r sponded, "So buy sculpture." IB

Now Celebrating Our 200th Year of Worldwide Scarcity.

In an era obsessed with production both mass and fast, our snail-pace distilling and blending methods are woefully archaic. For seven admittedly stubborn generations we've placed a much higher value on final quality than final quantity.

This is precisely why our rums have earned a rather cult-like following, not to mention numerous awards. It's also why we refuse to shortcut our methods in order to hasten the output. If this means you won't find a bottle of Gosling's on every shelf and bar, so it must be. Anything exceptional is worth a little extra effort. On both of our parts.

FIT FOR '06

Crowded exercise classes and waiting lines for equipment at the gym tell us that Bostonians have joined the rest of the country in making the traditional New Year's resolution. If your jeans feel snug after holiday bingeing, chances are you're among the throngs pledging to cut calories and tone up. We're behind you all the way, and we've packed our first issue of '06—devoted to health, fitness and beauty—with advice for looking and feeling good.

In "Fitness Myth-Busting," Courtney Humphries debunks some of the most commonly held beliefs about exercise and diet. You'll want to check it out for the experts' take on "hot" yoga, protein and muscle-building, light versus heavy weights and more. Wendy Wolfson's "Boston Breakthroughs" adds to your health IQ with summaries of 10 fascinating local health and fitness studies on topics as diverse as sleep's effects on memory, PMS prevention, and germs and air travel.

Fashion and beauty editor Samantha House rounds it out with tips for reviving your partied-out face and a fashion spread that shows you how to easily transform your work clothes and makeup into a glamorous night-on-the-town look.

UP WITH THE SUBURBS

I wanted to let you know how much I appreciated "Adventures in Suburbia" (Dec. 21). I'm a big fan of a number of places mentioned, especially Alchemy and Ula Blue. If you decide to take the piece further, another city worth checking out is Salem. It has incredible housing and fantastic shops opening on a regular basis, and it's slowly but surely becoming a dining destination, too. Thanks again for mentioning the North Shore. I look forward to future adventures!

—SARAH PETRYK

COLOR BLIND

Blonde, brunette, redhead—it matters not. Like Ezra's formerly blonde girlfriend ("One Nonblonde," Dec. 7), I recently decided to break out of the high-maintenance hair-coloring cycle. I discovered that my dyed locks had been covering up a beautiful sheen of platinum. Good-bye, high-maintenance; hello, au naturel. As for beauties with dark tresses, note that the new Miss World (from Iceland) and the runners-up (from Mexico and Puerto Rico) are all brunettes. Let's get over the superficial and move onto the truth. All people have natural beauty, which doesn't need to be covered up with dyes and makeovers.

Makeup artist Jenny Brown used a MAC shadow in the color Electra, and for an "extra pop" mixed it with MAC pigment in the color Silver Fog.

Deconstructed Caesar salad. Left: Tea Time Dessert

Nearing Nirvana

It doesn't take much prompting to get Om co-owner Bik Yonjan to gush about the décor of his freshly minted lounge and restaurant; but then, not many local eateries have so much to boast about. Yonjan and his business partner, Solmon Chowdhury, have turned the long-vacant space across from Grendel's and Upstairs on the Square into two stylish levels of Asian-themed space for dining and drinking. With the aim of putting their clientele at ease (hence the meditative name), Om has more to offer than just a good time.

To begin with, the downstairs bar/lounge (managed by Clif Travers, who was spirited away from Cuchi Cuchi) provides a unique selection of drinks with an emphasis on—yes, you're reading this correctly—aromatherapy. The RoseMaya, for example, is a martini with infusions of dill, cucumber and (of course) rose essence; and the Fred and Ginger blends champagne with lemon and wafts of ginger. Om is also bursting with playful treats for the eye. In the lounge area, a cascading wall of water illuminated by softly glowing LEDs greets those who enter the hand-carved wooden doors (imported, like the rest of the restaurant's striking décor, from Tibet and Nepal). Flatscreen displays of swirling fractals are a new-world counterpoint to the traditional Tibetan painting on the opposite wall, made by Yonjan's father.

Upstairs in the L-shaped dining area there are no bad seats, with most tables overlooking the Square. Starters like "deconstructed" Caesar salad and duck confit whet the appetite, which will be amply appeased by chef Rachel Klein (you may remember her from NYC's Savoy or, most recently, the lauded Lot 401 in Providence). Klein's menu is modern American "with [a] global edge." For example the signature dish, steak and eggs ($36), is a juicy, grilled filet mignon topped by a fried truffle egg and served with Yukon potato purée and a neat stack of asparagus.

The artful desserts are just as impressive. Pastry chef Cristina Valente so outdid herself with her Rainier olive oil lemon cake (with jalapeño-spiked pineapple confit) and the four-piece Tea Time Dessert that we were (for once) distracted from the chocolate-intensive options. Perhaps next time—and there will be a next time. Appetizer prices range from $9–$22; entrée prices range from $18-$36. 5 pm–1 am. 57 JFK St. (entrance on Winthrop Street), Cambridge (617-576-2800). www.omrestaurant.com. —E.G.

INNER VIEW

Bert Sugar

Sixty-nine-year-old Bert Sugar is boxing's foremost his torian. During the past 30 years, he's written more tha 80 books, including Boxing's Greatest Fighters, whic came out in December. Sugar also hosts Ringside o ESPN Classic. He'll be part of a panel discussion at th Sports Museum in TD Banknorth Garden on Jan. 1 after a screening of the documentary The SuperFight Marciano vs. Ali.

Improper Bostonian: In your opinion, who would win this fictional fight: Ali or Marciano?

Bert Sugar: It'd be Ali, but it's unfair because he's s much bigger: 224 pounds to Marciano's 184.

IB: What's your take on the current state of boxing?

BS: There is none. The problem with boxing is that th heavyweights hold the flagship position, and the heavy weights are currently nonexistent.

IB: How about the recent fight in which Johnny Ruiz lost a tough decision to that seven-foot freak?

BS: That just reaffirms that the heavyweight division is sideshow.

IB: Would you ever pay to see Mike Tyson fight again?

BS: No. I boycotted him back when he fought Lenno Lewis in 2002. There are rules in boxing—that's wha separates it from assault and battery. Tyson adheres t no rules.

IB: What if he boxed a kangaroo?

BS: A dancing bear, maybe.

IB: You love to collect baseball memorabilia. Any interest in joining the battle between the Red Sox and Doug Mientkiewicz for that World Series ball?

BS: I think it belongs to the Sox, but I also think they pa too much attention to who owns the ball and not wh owns Johnny Damon.

IB: Is Sly going to pull off Rocky VI?

BS: Sly looks great, and they're going to do i right, because he's a perfectionist. This Marciano Ali movie actually planted the seed for the idea of Rocky VI, and I've shot a couple scenes for this movie where I break down Rocky Balboa's fight against a much younger fighter named Mason "The Line" Dixon. It should be great.

TASTY TIDBITS

Craving Cupcakes

Like Butter... Former lawyer and South End resident Richard Gordon and his partner, New York–based investment manager Andrew Barker, used to walk by the corner of Shawmut Avenue and Union Park and think what a great place it would be for a neighborhood café. A year ago the duo stopped thinking about it and got down to business, opening the South End Buttery last month. To head the bakery/café's kitchen, Barker and Gordon hired Andrew Brown, former sous chef at Pigalle, and Patty Gardner, former sous chef at Azure, who whip up homemade comfort food like soups, sandwiches, chilis and pastries. We recommend the Madison, Simon or Harriet cupcakes, which are named after the owners' three dogs. A percentage of proceeds from the pooch-named cupcakes benefits the MSPCA. 314 Shawmut Ave., Boston (617-482-1015). www.southendbuttery.com.

Krispy Kremed... Score another win for local donut deity Dunkin' Donuts. In December, Krispy Kreme announced that the company is abandoning all but one of its Massachusetts locations, a retail shop in Dedham. Last August, the store at the Pru shut down, and on Dec. 9, Krispy Kremes in Everett, Saugus and Medford all closed their doors. The closings are part of the company's massive restructuring after a recent investigation into Krispy Kreme's accounting practices. Somewhere up there, Fred the Baker is smiling.

The Life Aquatic... The Trinity Restaurant Group, which opened South a few months ago in South Boston and has plans to bring the Howard Johnson's Café chain back to Massachusetts this winter, isn't taking a break. They've recently announced plans to open another one-word restaurant in Southie: Ocean. The 250-seat eatery will offer seafood from an array of coastal regions; Marylan crab cakes, cedar plank salmon and jalapeño-glaze swordfish are among the menu items. And we' told the sea-themed décor will be all-out, with nautilus-shell-lined ceiling lighted with fiber optics, cobalt-blue terrazzo floor and even a glass-enclose bar meant to create the sensation of bei underwater. www.trinityrestaurantgroup.com.

New Vintage... Boston lawyer David Parato teamed up with his Boston College classmat Stalin Colinet, a former NFL defensi end–turned–real estate developer, and entertai ment lawyer Sandra Missakian to create a ne restaurant—with an upscale lounge, natch. Vintag Lounge is scheduled to open mid-March in Fol Boston's building on Broad Street, and the upscale sp will be a far cry from Paratore's other venture, th Yawkey Way bar Who's on First. Boasting "Style and Sophis cation," Vintage will let diners sip wine and nibble on cheese plates in addition ordering full-course offerings. 72 Broad St., Boston (617-795-2279). www. boston.com.

Lucky Sevens... It's been seven years of business for Japanese-themed Fugakyu Coolidge Corner, and they're celebrating with a special anniversary menu for their cu tomers. Through Jan. 31, Fugakyu is offering seven anniversary dishes for an affordab $7 apiece. Dishes include deep-fried-apple haru maki, salmon tosazu and soy be maki. 1280 Beacon St., Brookline (617-734-1268).

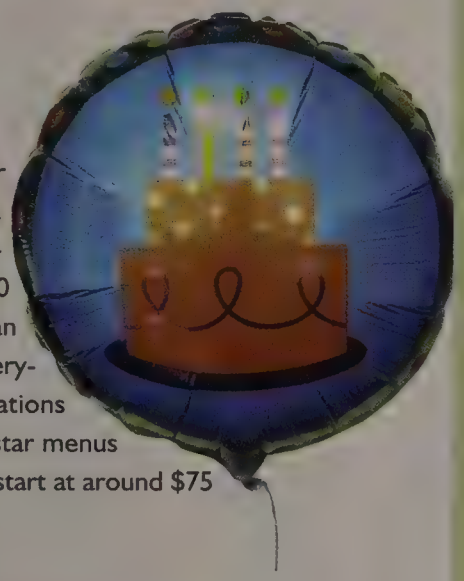
IMPROPER REPORTS

Party Planners

Want to throw a party but don't want to plan it? Whether it's a birthday blowout or a quiet get-together, these professional party planners can handle it.



A Prima Creations

(617-557-0000). www.aprimacreations.com

In the party-planning biz for more than 20 years, A Prima Creations has planned everything from get-togethers for 20 to lavish parties for more than 1,000. APC can take care of everything from personalized invitations and party gifts to creating five-star menus and floral arrangements. Costs start at around $75 per person.

Corinthian Events

(617-450-0600). www.corinthianevents.com

Corinthian isn't afraid to theme it up, throwing concept parties like Woodstock, a '70s–themed party with Astroturf floors and inflatable furniture, and a Jamaican-themed party complete with a 25-piece steel drum group and a performance by Ziggy Marley. Costs range from $100 to $600 per person.

Creative Events, Inc.

(617-267-2244). www.creativeeventsinc.com

Back Bay's Creative Events likes to get personal with parties; it will organize an event for as few as 10 guests. The company charges a flat rate based on an event's size and complexity.

Jen Hawkins Events

(617-566-1774). www.jenhawkinsevents.com

A recent JHE event featured models in sexy Santa costumes serving cocktails and a gingerbread-house-building contest—using actual architectural plans. Since JHE only throws 15 parties a year, be sure to put in your request early. Rates start at $250 per guest.

Rafanelli Events

(617-357-1818). www.rafanellievents.com

With party sizes typically between 200 and 1,000 people, Bryan Rafanelli's team thinks big. Their 100 yearly events are mostly nonprofit galas, but they also do private parties. Costs are hourly, ranging from $250-$2,000 per guest.

Twist Event Design & Management

(617-916-5845). www.twist-events.com

With over 20 years of event-planning experience, Lisa Laniado and Abby Rordorf opened Twist Event Design & Management over two years ago, taking common party ideas and adding creative twists. Recently the Twist team transformed a suburban country club into an urban lounge with a velvet, 32-foot cocktail bar and giant disco ball. Twist does 3-D invites, venue design and setup, floral arrangements and more. Costs start at $1,500. —Sarah McCormick

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

Simply Showing... A new program on WGBH called Real Simple, based on the lifestyle magazine of the same name, has just wrapped up two locally shot episodes. The Jan. 21 episode tells the story of Amy Hannes, a Boston-based personal chef who gave up a career as a lawyer to pursue her dream of starting her own company. The second episode, airing Feb. 11, concentrates on Arax Market, an Armenian grocery store on Mt. Auburn Street in Watertown. Barbara Ghazarian, author of the cookbook Simply Armenian, takes viewers on a tour of the market and shares secrets to getting the best ingredients for authentic Armenian cuisine. The half-hour show airs Saturdays on Channel 2 at 4 pm and repeats the following Thursday on Channel 44 at 9 pm.

Globally Speaking... Local cell phone service MobileSphere has been offering Boston-area college kids super-low international calling rates for almost five years. Now, the Faneuil Hall–based company is offering their service to anyone and everyone who lives in the States. Unlike other services, there's no sign-up charge or monthly fee, and with rates that range from 5 to 12 cents per minute to any international city, it's quite a deal, especially since most international calling companies don't provide services for cell phone users. To sign up, fill out the online enrollment, receive a confirmation with dialing instructions and a user ID, and after your cell phone provider acknowledges the new service, you'll get MobileSphere's low rates. www.cellularld.com.

Sublime Design... No longer will we have to hop around town to get our fix of retail products from Vessel. That's because the home-goods honchos recently opened their first retail store on Kingston Street in the Leather District. For the last three years, the Boston-based owners only sold their merchandise through the Vessel Web site and at local shops like Bliss Home, Motley and Abodeon. Vessel's original designs combine function with style, in items like Candelas (their best-known product), Candeloos, a furniture line called Squat and unique dish sets. 125 Kingston St., Boston (617-292-0982). www.vessel.com.

Modern Mastery... When Michael Manes, founder and owner of the New York-based M2L furniture stores, started his own business in 1992, he created a haven for those who appreciate authentic "re-introductions." He later expanded to Washington, D.C., and his new Boston spot on Boylston is slated to open Jan. 23. "We like to be where the top architecture firms are located, like Boston," Manes says. "It has a great history of modern design." Manes' pieces are based on designs that date as far back as 1906, licensed for production and made with permission from the artists or their families. Featured designers include Eileen Gray, Josef Hoffmann, Walter Knoll, Pierre Paulin and Bauhaus-movement founder Walter Gropius. 104 Boylston St., Boston (617-338-0095). www.m2lcollection.com. —L.P.K.

FOUNDATION LOUNGE

10-4, GOOD BUDDY

The best entertainment on the airwaves isn't on TV or FM radio—it's on the scanner.

Have you seen that movie Sin City? I didn't think its shock value lived up to the hype. See, it's hard to be disturbed by a "dark" fictional movie when you can turn on your TV and see something as grotesque and sickly perverted as a bald, earring-wearing Howie Mandel. (Ewww, I got a creepy shiver just writing that.) But since his game show was only on for a week, I have to get my bone-chilling revulsions in a new way: I listen in on what's happening in our own city. I got myself a police scanner.

Before buying it to do research for a story, I'd always associated police scanners with the type of cop wannabes who work part-time on the local police force, yet own all the latest handcuffs and concealed pepper-spray ankle holsters. These are the guys who listen to the police radio traffic while sitting at home, who watch Cops and fantasize about one day growing a mustache. And now, I'm one of those guys. I bought the scanner because I needed it. I'm keeping it because I love it. For about $100, this is high entertainment. Who needs reality TV when you've got reality walkie-talkie?

On the scanner, you hear about stuff that somehow misses the news. And that's actually scary, because you'd think that between the newspapers and the local TV, you'd hear about every case of aggravated jaywalking and felony shoplifting from Brockton to Belmont. Not so. Consider that the other day I turned on the scanner and within five minutes heard about a high-speed chase involving a stolen car. The cop chasing the car thief sounded bored as he reported, "Pontiac Grand Am, we're in pursuit…I'm sorry, it's a Pontiac Grand Prix." A few minutes later: "He took a turn and we lost him." What? You can actually get away from the cops in a chase in the city? That's like a streaker successfully escaping from security at Fenway. I guess that thief was glad he went for the Grand Prix instead of the Grand Am.

A getaway car, stolen or otherwise, would've been a good idea for another guy who broke into a house in Jamaica Plain and fled on foot until he reached his escape vehicle: the bus. The cops sounded slightly worried at first, as they reported chasing the guy through a Texaco station parking lot. Then came the bemused report, "He just got on the bus for Forest Hills." Another cop came on and said, "I'm going to go ahead and pull over the bus." Criminals, how many times do I have to tell you? Don't leave any witnesses, and don't include the MBTA in your escape plan. This guy definitely wouldn't have been accepted into Ocean's Eleven, or even Ocean's Twelve.

Elsewhere in the city (I didn't get the 10-4 on the location, Roger that), I heard about a trio of unsavory characters who robbed a pedestrian at gunpoint. You'd think that robbing someone at gunpoint would be a straightforward matter of pointing your gun and demanding the cash, but these robbers added an ice breaker before getting down to business. According to the dispatcher, "They asked the victim for the time and then they robbed him." Imagine how that transpired: "Excuse me, do you know what time it is?…Time to give me all your money!" The lesson here is obvious: If someone on the street in Boston asks you for the time, you should throw your wallet down and run. What are you gonna do, be a hero and check your watch? Tell your what, buddy, you know where there are lots of heroes? Heaven, that's where.

With all these criminals, you might think it's safer just to stay home. You'd be wrong, as one woman found out when a bullet came in through her apartment window and lodged in the ceiling. The detective noted that it didn't make it through the upstairs apartment's floor, which is nice for them at least. Meanwhile, Bullet Woman was having a better day than some kids who were about to get busted for an underage party. That's just how the cop put it: "There's about to be an underage party." And how do cops learn about parties before they happen? I'm guessing someone who didn't get invited made an ill-conceived phone call. That person is now at best a social leper and at worst a severely beaten social leper. As for the kids throwing the party, they were dumb too. They should've invested in a scanner first. iB

THE COLLINS CARD

BY CHRIS COLLINS

PILEUP ON CAUSEWAY

Thornton is gone, but the Bruins' troubles remain.

What have the Bruins done now? The one guy I'd pay to see at the new Garden; the one guy I'd religiously check out on box scores; the one guy who was clearly the cornerstone of the franchise for the next decade: Buh-bye, he's gone.

Joe Thornton now plays for the San Jose Sharks. It's been a few weeks since the deal and I'm still shaking my head.

Trading away your biggest star is unconventional. If it works, well, the guys upstairs in the administrative offices know more than we give them credit for. I'd even throw out the words "hockey geniuses." If it doesn't work, things get ugly.

Welcome to the Ugly Era of Boston Bruins hockey.

It's pointless even to name the three players the Bruins received in exchange for Thornton because, unless you've been scouting the San Jose Sharks, you probably wouldn't know them.

Heck, it's my job to know these guys, but I'd be lying if I said I could tell you their strengths and weaknesses. Statistics? I've never seen any of their names anywhere near the NHL leaders lists.

But I do know the Sharks' new franchise player very well. He's Joe Thornton. Over his first five games he averaged two points a game and the Sharks won every game. Meanwhile, your Boston Bruins continued to play sub-.500 hockey.

When talking to the man who put his signature on this trade, Bruins general manager Mike O'Connell, I wanted answers. Why this trade? Why for these three guys? Why?

I've had a rather shaky history with the Bruins GM. We haven't seen eye-to-eye for some time now. Let's just say trust is an issue. But on this day O'Connell was very candid.

When I asked him about why things didn't work out for Thornton in Boston, he said, "Maybe we didn't kiss Joe's butt enough."

Whoa, my goodness. In this day and age of dancing around the truth in professional sports, it's a refreshing answer.

Thornton's career in Boston was great on the stats pages. But the stat that dogged him was his performance in the playoffs. The Bruins had won only one playoff series during Thornton's career. Something had to change, and change quickly, before the whole season was a wash. But to trade the franchise player? I'm still having trouble feeling good about it.

O'Connell, who's on the verge of getting the boot from hockey and starting up his own landscaping business, showed some guts in trading Thornton. Jumbo Joe didn't take the trade lightly. He quickly went on the offensive, questioning the organization's commitment to winning.

Thornton said he was blindsided by this move, and I believe him. To give you an idea of how much in the dark he was, the night before the trade I was talking to his brother, John, one of Joe's agents. We discussed which moves the B's might make. It was obvious something was going down.

We figured the coach, Mike Sullivan, would be fired. Or they'd trade three or four players to get a pair of defensemen who can actually defend. Maybe this would even be the end for O'Connell as GM of the Bruins?

Instead it was Joe who'd be shown the door.

And that's too bad. At one time, local sports fans had hockey at the top of their list when it came to pro sports. You could've argued hockey was as big in New England as in Toronto. We were as rabid as rabid can be.

THORNTON SAID HE WAS BLINDSIDED BY THIS MOVE, AND I BELIEVE HIM

As I continued my discussion with O'Connell, I also understood more than ever that this was a man with a family, one kid in college and another in high school. Nobody wants the team to win more than he does. And every night when the Bruins play uninspired hockey and Thornton's out on the left coast playing target practice, O'Connell gets closer to the end of his Bruins tenure.

O'Connell is owner Jeremy Jacobs' bad cop, sort of like Larry Lucchino is to John Henry with the Red Sox. But as O'Connell walked out of the NECN studio, I couldn't help feeling bad for him. He's in big trouble, and he knows it.

Unless the Bruins turn things around very soon, somebody else is going to have to pay with their job, just like Joe did. ■

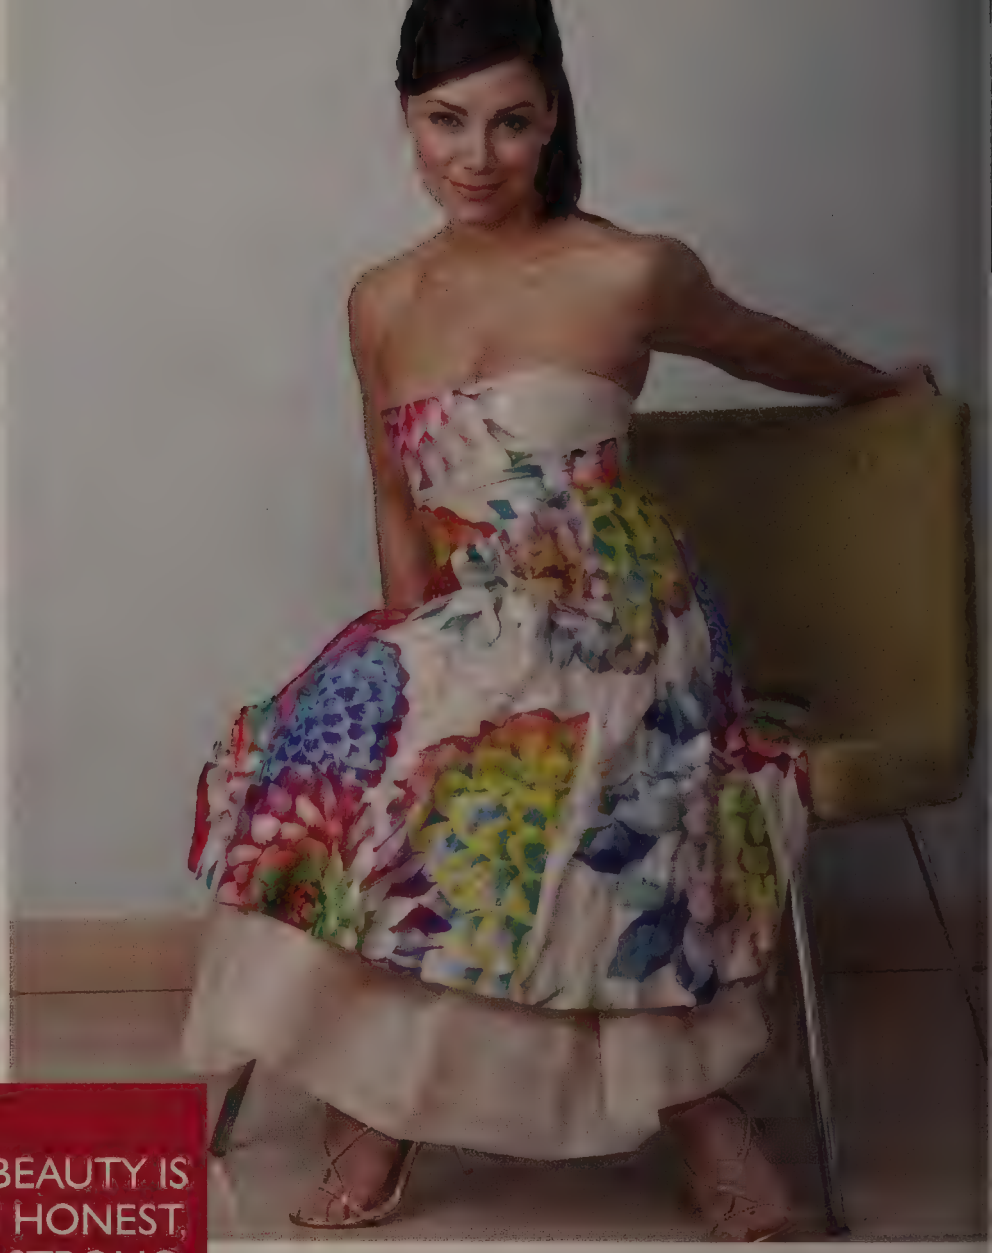
GRETCHEN MONAHAN

BY JONATHAN SOROFF



Fashion and beauty entrepreneur Gretchen Monahan was born and raised in Cambridge and Waltham, respectively. As a teenager, she worked for fashion retailing legend Yolanda at her eponymous bridal boutique in Waltham. Upon graduating from Waltham High, Monahan attended New York's Fashion Institute of Technology. (More recently, she received a degree from the Harvard Business School.) After doing hair and makeup to support herself, she opened Grettacole in Wellesley 10 years ago, followed by a second location in Chestnut Hill. She branched out into fashion retailing with her Gretta Luxe fashion boutique; in 2002 she opened the Grettacole/Gretta Luxe flagship store in Copley Place; and a year later she added to her empire with G Spa on Newbury Street. Among her latest endeavors is the new Gretta Style Studio in New York, which offers private fashion styling and beauty services by invitation only. She's been featured in beauty and fashion magazines, including Vogue, The New York Times and Town & Country, has appeared regularly on the Today Show, Good Morning America and The View, and her expertise led TLC to tap her as the host of A Makeover Story. She lives in Boston with her boyfriend.

Jonathan Soroff: What one thing would you attribute your success to?

Gretchen Monahan: Probably my ignorance. [Laughs.] I didn't realize what I was getting into. I was really young. I had nothing to lose. Even now, I have a taste for adventure. I believe in "No risk, no reward," and I live by those kind of gritty fundamentals every day.

JS: Where did you develop your exquisite taste?

GM: Well, thanks. I'd say working at Yolanda's as a kid. Changing out of my cheerleading outfit every day to serve coffee to women like Diahann Carroll from Dynasty. Yolanda even had a women's spa, which back then was not commonplace, and she had fashion, so I really saw what goes into taking care of these women and being that beautiful. I got to unpack beautiful furs and beautiful clothing.

JS: Greatest beauty secret?

GM: Laughing. I think it keeps your face toned, and stress and anger just make us ugly. Whether someone's 18 or 80, they look better with a smile on their face.

JS: What one beauty tip would you offer someone who could only do one thing to enhance their looks?

GM: I'd say groom your brows. To have a unibrow or an undefined brow doesn't (a) make you look well-kept, or (b) enhance your eyes, which I think are the seat of the soul.

JS: What one thing do most men not do that you wish they did?

GM: I wish men would take better care of their skin. They're missing out on such an absolute pleasure. It's a kind of legal free touch, and I don't get why they don't see that, since men are all about that. They could be surrounded by hot babes touching them, and their significant other wouldn't get mad.

JS: One person in the public eye you'd most like to make over?

GM: One person I think is brilliant and smart, but I just don't get what's going on—I think she has a kind of erratic, experimental styling going on day-to-day—is Katie Couric.

JS: Anyone in the public eye you'd emulate?

GM: Oh, God, so many. I really like people who express themselves and who don't follow the pack. It might sound strange, but I think Ellen DeGeneres has her own sense of style and taste that she doesn't budge on, and I like that.

JS: Biggest mistake most women make with respect to their looks or their dress?

GM: In general, I truly believe less is more.

JS: OK, the biggest mistake they make with their hair?

GM: Overcolored and going too far away from their natural shade.

JS: With makeup?

"TRUE BEAUTY IS AN HONEST, STRONG, HEALTHY SPIRIT. IT'S ABOUT EXPRESSING YOURSELF CONFIDENTLY."

JS: Clothes?

GM: The number one problem I see is that people don't know their size, and more than half the time they're wearing clothes that are too big, which is unflattering and matronly. Almost everyone looks too old.

JS: Do women dress for other women or for men?

GM: I think ultimately we're dressing to attract the opposite sex, but quite consciously it's also about getting validation from your girls. Nothing makes me feel better than when another woman says, "Wow, I love that bag," or "Where'd you get that dress?"

JS: Botox or Restylane?

GM: Both. You betcha.

JS: How about plastic surgery?

GM: Absolutely, if it makes you feel better. But don't get lost in it, or change what's beautiful about you. Do it to preserve your beauty and look your best. That's absolutely critical, because we don't need any more cat women. There's far too much of that.

JS: Fashion trend you anticipated way in advance?

GM: Well, the one I'm committed to, regardless of what anyone says, is that I think women want to be comfortable, wear a lot of pants, dress sensibly. And suits live forever.

JS: One thing that top models, movie stars and socialites know that most women don't?

GM: It's smoke and mirrors. They know how to use beauty and fashion and take care of themselves as an investment i their own brand. That's what I want t convey to women: Don't slight yoursel Pamper yourself. And don't think for minute that all those personalities don look just as plain as you do without th makeup.

JS: Are you always on a diet?

GM: Pretty much, yeah. I go to a trainer t beat the hell out of me so that I can ea because I will not skip dessert.

JS: What's your personal definition of beauty?

GM: True beauty is an honest, stron healthy spirit. It's about expressing yourse confidently and living by your own set rules.

JS: One thing you'd never be caught dead wearing?

GM: Camouflage.

JS: Is Carson Kressley just about the most annoying human alive, or what?

GM: Yeah, just about. For me, he's pret tough. I don't watch him.

JS: Favorite item of women's clothing?

GM: Lingerie. I'm quite taken with L Perla. It's very fantasy. My poor boyfrien usually doesn't even see it, because he's a ready asleep by the time I get home. It more for me.

JS: Last question: Do you feel beautiful?

GM: Yeah, and it's not because of m looks. I have felt not beautiful, and it's usu ally because I feel alone and distant. Bu when I come home to Boston, I feel beauti ful again, because I'm surrounded by peo ple who make me feel good. IB

HOST OF THE "MATTY IN THE MORNING" SHOW FOR 25 YEARS AND COUNTING, MATT SIEGEL ISN'T SLOWING DOWN.

TALKING ON air

BY EZRA DYER

On Jan. 12, Matt Siegel, 55, will celebrate his 25th anniversary as host of the "Matty in the Morning" show on KISS 108. Over the years, Siegel has won his share of accolades, including the 2001 National Association of Broadcasters' Marconi Award for Personality of the Year—Major Market, one of the highest honors in radio. "Matty in the Morning" is KISS 108's highest-rated show, as well as the leading FM morning show in Boston. According to Arbitron ratings, "Matty in the Morning" has consistently ranked No. 1 with women ages 18–49 for the past 20 years. Siegel's interview subjects have included stars from Oprah to Madonna to Tom Cruise. He lives in Newton with his wife, Maryann, and daughters, Alexandra, Chloe, Lilly and Olivia.

Ezra Dyer: Six years ago you said Oprah was your most intimidating interview. Is she still the reigning champ?

Matt Siegel: Well, that was more a function of going out to her hotel to interview her, and I've conquered my fear of going out by not going out any more. That cured that. I'm so much more comfortable in my own studio. I've since interviewed Hillary Clinton, Tom Cruise, Al Gore … but Oprah was in her suite at the Four Seasons, with her little dog running around and everything. It was fun, but it wasn't really comfortable. I guess that's one of the privileges of living long enough. They have to come to you. It's like the mountain coming to Mohammed.

ED: So have you and Gay Jim gone to see Brokeback Mountain yet?

MS: We did, but we didn't hold hands. I guess I'm not his type.

ED: How does getting up before dawn every day affect your social life?

MS: I don't have much of a social life. I have four daughters and a wife. I don't get out much. But I don't get up early. I get up at 5:30, 6 am. That's everybody's first question and they're always disappointed. People want me to get up at 3 am. And they're bitter when they find out I get done at 10. But my staff gets up at 4 am, and you're only as good as your staff. I'm lucky: I have a good team.

ED: This is a question from our fashion editor, Samantha: What does burning Prada smell like?

MS: It smells like sulfur. It's wool. Think how bad wet wool smells. Then set it on fire. Think about what a burning sheep would smell like. The story there is that I did a photo shoot with her, and in her bathroom was a candle, and I had this black Prada suit, and I came out of the bathroom on fire. I put myself out, but I destroyed the suit. How do you explain that to someone?

ED: What's on your iPod?

MS: Country, a fair amount of that. I broke into the business in Arizona, so country's stayed with me. And R&B. One of my kids is 13, and she really likes my songs. Her sisters think she's strange. But young girls like country because each song tells a little story—about someone leaving his wife or something. Billy [Costa, news and entertainment reporter for "Matty"] is convinced I cry at stoplights.

ED: If you call Billy "the Mayor," what does that make you?

MS: Probably "the Brother," the one they don't let out—like Jimmy Carter's brother. I'm more of a recluse. It's a cliché that the radio guys are shy, but I've stopped all public appearances. I'd rather be with my family. It sounds corny, but it's true. I don't have the interest. I play golf, that's my hobby. If I go out with Billy, it's funny. I feel like somebody who just moved here. I just blend. I don't get recognized that much any more. I don't present myself that way. If I screw up and forget to make a reservation, I'll have somebody from the office call. Then I'll use my name if I have to. But my wife and I usually sit at the bar. We don't even get reservations. I don't try to be cool about it, it just doesn't appeal to me.

ED: You have Jerry Falwell in the Dead Pool. How come nobody has Wilford Brimley?

MS: This is one thing I found: Tabloids will put a lot of people near death, and they're not. Jerry Falwell was dying, now he's fine. Billy won with the Pope, and Billy's Catholic. He's gonna burn in hell.

ED: How do you feel about Howard Stern being replaced by David Lee Roth?

MS: Well, I don't have much feeling about David Lee Roth, but I have a lot about Howard. What I find unsettling is his spin on it. He's getting an obscene amount of money, but he's acting like he's moving to satellite because of restrictions on his show, as if he's some great intellect. The guy does fart jokes. Now he's getting half a billion dollars, and he'll be rich beyond his wildest dreams. But to think that he's leaving as some kind of righteous move is insulting to our intelligence.

ED: Your show is consistently rated No. 1 with women ages 18–49. Why do chicks dig you?

MS: I don't know. I have a sort of timing that works with women. It's not a sex appeal thing—although wouldn't that have been nice? But I can make women laugh. As a kid, I knew it then. I'd be on the playground, in fourth grade, telling stories with girls sitting around me laughing—and as long as they're not pointing when they're laughing, that's a good thing. KISS is a woman-targeted station, so it's a fit, but it's more than that. Playing pop songs doesn't guarantee you'll be No. 1. It's not like we're talking about doing your hair or anything specifically targeted at women. But they think I'm funny, and it's a slightly different brand of comedy. It has to do with some self-deprecation. I'm able to go to naughty places and it comes out slightly different, so it's not The Man Show. I say sexist things all the time and I get away with it, because they say, "That's just Matty." I can say what I really think and get away with it.

"THE TRUTH IS, AT THIS POINT IN MY CAREER I COULD SAY ANYTHING I WANT, AWFUL THINGS. THE WORST THING THAT'LL HAPPEN IS THAT THE BOSS WILL STOP BY AND SAY, 'YOU ALL RIGHT TODAY?' "

ED: And part of that is because of your longevity?

MS: Right. I've been around long enough to be able to say what I want and not worry about it. It's one of the perverse things about radio—when you're young and have no job security, you have to act like you've been there forever. If you hold back, you lose. The cautious ones very rarely make it. The truth is, at this point in my career I could say anything I want, awful things. The worst thing that'll happen is that the boss will stop by and say, "You all right today?" Someone new would get fired. So the hardest part of the business is that when you're the most terrified, you have to act like you're confident, and that's tricky. In show business, you earn your money when you're not making any at all. You'll never work as hard as you work when you're nobody. I made $1.80 per hour on my first job. I did the morning drive show in Arizona for $360 per month, and I did it for three years. But I thought I was cool, I was on the radio. I was happy; imagine that. I could've been fired at any time. I didn't have a contract. Now that I make a good living, it's no problem. You're rewarded at the end. If you think I'm overpaid, look at all the years I was underpaid, and it's fair.

ED: Well, speaking of that, I don't know your exact salary, but I calculated that you probably make more than $1,000 per hour. What advice would you give to budding radio hosts hoping to someday make $1,000 per hour interviewing Corey Feldman?

MS: You know something, Corey is a misunderstood artist. I think we really bonded. But to answer your question, radio is a difficult way to make money, because they only pay the big morning guys. I'll tell you, what's fascinating to me is that more people don't go into it. Why is Howard making half a billion dollars? Because there aren't many competitors. He's good, but he's not that good. Why aren't the younger guys getting into it? I think the answer is that this looks easy, but it isn't. We've had hilarious comedians who can't do it. It's not hard for me, because it's like a freak skill. It's like those guys in Cirque du Soleil. It's not normal. That's like what it is for those of us, those 20 or 30 of us in the country, who can sustain big numbers in morning radio. It's the ability to go on the radio every day and tell little stories about yourself and have it be amusing. It's similar to hosting late-night TV. It's not intelligence, it's just a certain kind of wit. I couldn't do stand-up comedy. I couldn't write a funny book. I'm like a double-jointed Cirque du Soleil guy. What I do is very specific. It's weird, isn't it? I don't know what I'd do if I didn't do this. I'd work in Star Market, and I'd be bad at that. I'm a good dancer, though.

ED: Have you considered auditioning for Dancing with the Stars*?*

MS: I'm waiting for them to come to me. I think I'd actually be a good gigolo for extremely old women.

ED: What's your worst fear?

MS: Besides the parental fears, something happening to my kids? In terms of my career, just that the ratings go down, and there's that awkward decision, "Should I go quietly?" I'm irrationally afraid of that. Mostly because I don't know why I'm successful, and I have this irrational fear that someday it'll go away. If you're a carpenter, it's not like you're going to wake up one day and not know how to build a shelf. But with comedy, tastes can change. If it's no longer funny to people, you go from being an entertainer to a bore. The good news is I'm a terrific accordion player.

ED: How has radio changed since 1981?

MS: The difference is that the government changed the rules on what you could own. It used to be that you could only have seven AM stations and seven FM stations, and now you've got the supercompanies. ClearChannel, which owns KISS, has 1,200 stations. Then you have Infinity. ... It's corporate now. If we want to paint the building, we'd have to get permission from Texas.

ED: Does that affect your show's autonomy?

MS: They have zero interest in governing my show. When they bought us, I was worried about that, but they only care about the ratings. If my ratings sucked, they might care. They don't interfere with the guys on the air, mostly because I don't think they understand how I do it. They don't know how it works, so they stay out of it. I'm telling you, we're like freaks in the circus. I mean, they respect us, but look at Rick Dees. He was a guy ClearChannel let go, and he was making many millions.

ED: Well, he was guilty of recording "Disco Duck."

MS: Hey, "Disco Duck" made $500,000 in the '70s. That was big money.

ED: Have you ever thought about syndication?

MS: We tried it in the early '90s, but the technology didn't work. In modern radio, there are a fair number of syndicated shows, but ClearChannel wasn't interested. Then they paid me enough money so I lost interest. In some ways, I'd like to be national, but I don't care that much. Also, the show is pretty Boston-centric.

ED: So a shared experience with your audience is important?

MS: Exactly. That's why I've come to realize that I can never escape the snow. Technically, it'd work, but practically, it wouldn't. I could do the show from Florida. The show is really all about me. It's about my look at things. It's real, I don't make it up. But if I was in Florida, there'd be no way I could act like I wasn't in Florida.

ED: So whaddaya think? Another 25 years?

MS: At least. You crazy? I'll be dead. I do want to walk away before I'm dead. Or do I? IB

A FEW MEMORABLE MOMENTS FROM THE PAST 25 YEARS

Back when we had Randy the intern, we started incorporating him into the show. After The Blair Witch Project came out, we made him camp out in the woods. We once had him deliver a goat to a house for no reason. We told the people that he had to leave the goat, with no explanations. The thing that made him quit was when we put him in front of the prison in Concord with prison clothes on and ankle chains and had him waving cars down trying to get a ride. He was arrested and thrown in jail. Supposedly, the guys in the guard tower were requesting permission to shoot him. The warden put the prison on lockdown and closed the jail. Billy and I actually had a discussion: If Randy got shot by the guards, what would've been the effect on our ratings? A wounding would've probably been ideal.

We had this producer, Jason, who was a very big man, like 6'7", 350 pounds. Jason would pick Billy up and twirl him around. Well, Jason was trying to lose weight and Billy got on him about eating something. Another producer, Ted, played a clip of Martin Lawrence from Bad Boys saying, "You're a big Popeye chicken–eating motherf—ker..." So Jason turned his anger to Ted instead of Billy. Jason goes to pick Ted up in the same way he picks up Billy, and Ted's not that skinny. Ted resisted, then they both fell to the ground, and Jason's leg snaps sideways. Live on the air, the big guy broke his leg in two places—now he's got that on top of us calling him fat. The ambulance guys got to the station and were looking for him outside. They figured he fell down the steps, and I said, "No, he's in the studio!" They couldn't believe it happened in the studio. To me, that is the essence of our little show. We goof around and it's a great way to make a living. Of course, it'd be different if it had been my leg.

I'd won the Marconi Award the weekend before Sept. 11, 2001. I was in New Orleans, and we were all talking about how we were going to promote the award that week. When Sept.11 happened, we dropped the whole show and didn't do jokes or music. They kept me on the air until 3 or 4 in the afternoon, just talking to people about what had happened. We got a letter from the widow of the captain of one of the flights. She said that after everyone who was offering condolences left her house, she was by herself, listening to the show, and it helped her. That was the most meaningful show in 25 years.

BY WENDY WOLFSON PHOTOGRAPHS BY ANDREW SWAINE

Boston is world-famous as a research powerhouse. Scientists and physicians at local universities and teaching hospitals are constantly working to understand how our bodies and minds work—and how they relate to each other. A lot of their research started with simple questions: What makes us remember new things? Can breakfast cereal help prevent cancer? And what would happen if we fed mice a steady diet of pomegranate juice? (OK, some questions are more obvious than others.) The answers can be surprising, and often they only point the way to more questions. With that in mind, here are some of the recent discoveries made by local researchers about your brain, heart and health.

To avoid flying germs, obey the two-row rule

Stuck in an airplane for hours on end? Chances are you'll catch whatever sniffles and sneezes your neighbors have—but only if they sit within two rows of you for more than eight hours, say physicians Alexandra Mangili of the Tufts-New England Medical Center in Boston and Mark A. Gendreau of the Lahey Clinic Medical Center in Burlington. The researchers found that ventilation systems and high efficiency particulate air (HEPA) filters used on many commercial aircraft limit transmission of nasty, catchy bugs. The good news is that about 85 percent of U.S. commercial airliners that carry more than 100 passengers and recirculate cabin air are equipped with these HEPA filters.

Some bugs don't obey the two-row rule, however. In a March 2003 SARS outbreak originating on a three-hour Air China flight from Beijing to Hong Kong, 22 passengers as far as seven rows away from the source passenger were infected. For airlines, the scientists recommend increased use of HEPA filters and good ventilation practices. For passengers, they advise putting off air travel while you are ill, so you don't infect others. And, of course, mind your manners: Wash your hands frequently, and cover your mouth when sneezing and coughing.

Can't remember anything? Maybe it's not the weed.

Most of our parents set strict bedtimes for us when we were kids, ensuring that we logged at least eight hours a night. Turns out Mom and Dad may have been onto something: In a recent paper in Nature, Robert Stickgold, associate professor of psychiatry at the Harvard Medical School, reviewed evidence showing that sleep is an important factor in how some memories are formed and ultimately shaped. Stickgold and his colleagues have carried out studies demonstrating that a good night's sleep triggers changes in stored memories. People performing memory-intensive activities, such as playing the piano or learning word lists, improve after a night's sleep but not during an equivalent period of being awake. "Total or partial sleep deprivation can prevent this normal overnight improvement," Stickgold reports. Such research may help explain why children, teenagers and especially infants sleep more than adults, and how brain-injured patients, such as stroke survivors, can relearn functions. Still, questions remain. "When sleep learning or consolidation does occur, we don't have a good understanding of when it takes place, in terms of which sleep stages and times of night," Stickgold notes. "Why these processes are preferentially or exclusively restricted to sleep is completely unknown."

The truth about bran

The Great Fiber Debate may be nearing a conclusion! For those unaware of the GFD, here's a recap: Scientists have long argued about what health benefits, if any, a cardboard-tasting cereal confers. Specifically, there's disagreement over whether a fiber-rich diet helps prevent certain types of cancer. In the largest-ever analysis of fiber and cancer data, Harvard School of Public Health researcher Yikyung Park and others analyzed studies involving almost three-quarters of a million people who were tracked for between six and 20 years to see if there was a link between a high-fiber diet and colorectal cancer. Among all participants, Park and her colleagues found more than 8,000 cases of colorectal cancer, and after adjusting the data for age, the researchers found that more fiber eaten resulted in more benefits. But when other dietary factors like alcohol and red meat were considered, the link was no longer statistically significant. Don't ditch that box of All Bran quite yet, though. The researchers concluded that even if bran doesn't ward off cancer, plant-based fiber can help prevent heart disease and diabetes.

Mice ❤ Pom Juice

A recent food fad might just be the real deal. Pomegranate juice, already known for its high level of antioxidants (it contains more than OJ, cranberry juice and red wine), may also reduce the fatty deposits on your artery walls and protect blood vessels by helping them to expand and relax. That means pom-juice drinkers have a reduced risk of coronary blockage, heart disease and stroke. Claudio Napoli, Professor of Medicine and Clinical Pathology at the University of Naples (and colleagues at BU Medical School, where he worked at the time of the study) cultured human cells that line the arteries of your heart and dosed them with pomegranate juice. They picked cells that had been disturbed by shear stress, caused by blood rushing over an uneven surface. Napoli found that pom treatment encourages shear-stressed cells to produce more nitric oxide, which in turn helps the cells expand. The researchers then fed pomegranate juice to mice that were specially bred to develop high cholesterol and clogged heart arteries. Presto: The mice that chugged pomegranate juice with their water developed fewer artery clogs.

Calcium and vitamin D reduce risk of PMS

Most women experience mild premenstrual symptoms but up to 20 percent suffer more severe effects. Eatin foods rich in calcium and vitamin D could help preven severe premenstrual syndrome, according to a researcl team led by epidemiologist Elizabeth R. Bertone-Johnso of UMass-Amherst. Bertone and her research team com pared the dietary intake of calcium and vitamin D i 1,057 women who developed PMS over a 10-year perio with that of 1,968 women who did not develop PMS "Our findings do suggest that high dietary intake of cal cium and vitamin D may help women by preventing th initial development of PMS," says Bertone-Johnson

Study participants ate a variety of foods rich in calcium and vitamin D, such as spinach and dairy products, and the comparison showed that calcium intake had a "substantial" effect on whether women developed PMS. The largest protective effect was seen in women who consumed about 1,200 milligrams of calcium and 500 IU of vitamin D per day. If that sounds like a lot, consider this: just four servings of milk give you 1,200 mg of calcium daily and 400 IU of vitamin D.

Exercise important to breast cancer recovery

Surgeon and breast cancer survivor Carolyn Kaelin, director of the Comprehensive Breast Health Center at Boston's Brigham and Women's Hospital, encourages breast cancer survivors to exercise. According to Kaelin, strength and endurance training, in addition to stretching, help survivors to regain range of motion, minimize bone loss and fatigue and, most importantly, improve their chances of long-term survival. The reason is simple: Increasing muscle mass and reducing fat may decrease the amount of estrogen in the body. And since estrogen, especially estrogen that's produced by belly fat, nourishes some types of breast cancer, the more muscle and less fat you have around your middle, the better your chances of long-term breast cancer survival. Kaelin's recommendation is supported by an increasing number of studies, including one in the May 25 Journal of the American Medical Association led by Harvard Medical School assistant professor Michelle D. Holmes. Using data taken from nearly 3,000 women diagnosed with non-metastatic breast cancer between 1984 and 1998, Holmes showed that women who do the equivalent of walking for 3-5 hours per week were 50 percent less likely to die from breast cancer, compared to inactive women with breast cancer.

Herpes vaccine may be near to first human tests

Twenty percent of Americans suffer from herpes simplex virus 2 (HSV-2), the primary cause of genital herpes. As one in five of you know, the incurable disease is unpleasant in healthy adults. What's worse is that it can be deadly to people with compromised immune systems and to newborns infected by their mothers. But a potential vaccine, which has been in development for 15 years by professor David Knipe at Harvard Medical School, may soon be tested on humans. In animal tests on HSV-2, Knipe's vaccine outperformed the other two vaccines being tested—one of which had already been tested in humans. The new vaccine is a live, mutant strain of HSV-2 that's missing the set of genes enabling it to replicate and persist inside its host. The mutant virus can induce your body to fight it, Knipe says, "but the virus can't spread."

Western diet linked to diabetes in women

Bad news, donut lovers: The traditional Western diet, high in refined grain and processed meats, is linked to an increased risk of Type 2 diabetes in women, according to a recent report by nutrition professor Teresa Fung of the Simmons College School for Health Studies. While it had been known that diet is related to obesity, and obesity increases the risk of developing Type 2 diabetes, no conclusive data was available on whether diet has any bearing on diabetes beyond its effect on weight. Instead of isolating particular foods, Fung's study examined entire eating patterns of individuals. She examined data from studies dating from 1984, of nurses ages 30-55 living in the U.S. Women who followed the Western diet had a greater risk of Type 2 diabetes, particularly if they ate processed meats (think bacon and hot dogs). Overall, the Western diet raised the risk nearly 50 percent among the women.

Meditation strengthens your brain

A team led by Sara Lazar, scientist at the MGH Psychiatric Neuroimaging Research Program and instructor at Harvard Medical School, has found that regular meditation may actually bulk up your brain. The researchers studied MRIs of the brains of 20 people who practiced Buddhist insight meditation for about 40 minutes a day, and had been doing so for at least a year. Compared with a group of 15 people who didn't meditate, the meditators had thicker regions in the cerebral cortex that are associated with heart rate, breathing, emotions, and decision making. The differences were especially pronounced in older study participants, who had been practicing meditation for as long as 30 years. "Thickness was correlated with the amount of experience, so it suggests that it is a cumulative experience: The more you meditate, the thicker it will get," says Lazar, who stresses that this was a relatively small, short-term study. Still, the findings imply that exercising parts of your brain now may reduce the risk of their shriveling with age.

HapMap helps clarify human genetic diversity

At the genetic level, we're all 99.9 percent identical. The remaining 0.1 percent explains why each person has distinct physical features, is more susceptible to a disease or responds differently to medicines. An international consortium of researchers, including co-authors from the Broad Institute of MIT and Harvard, recently published initial work on a comprehensive catalog, known as the HapMap, that makes it easier to test specific parts of that 0.1 percent for their links to disease. The map plots genetic "neighborhoods," called haplotypes—gene groups that are inherited en masse from each of your parents. By studying variations among genes within a particular neighborhood, scientists hope to be able to more easily pinpoint which variations are beneficial and which are harmful. IB

doing yoga in a heated room

BY COURTNEY HUMPHRIES ILLUSTRATION BY ALLI ARNOLD

New Year's resolutions and post-holiday pounds are good for the fitness industry: January is the single biggest month for new gym memberships, according to the International Health, Racquet and Sportsclub Association. But whether you're joining a gym, revitalizing your fitness routine or getting into winter sports, it's time to start the new year by casting aside a few old ideas about fitness. Here's the truth behind some common fitness myths.

1) Eating extra protein helps you put on more muscle.

Wouldn't it be great if eating burgers and steaks every day helped your physique? It's a common myth that because muscle is largely made of protein, adding extra protein to your diet will help your muscles grow. Wayne Westcott, fitness research director at the South Shore YMCA, says that some research has shown that taking protein or creatine supplements temporarily adds muscle mass, but the effect is largely due to water retention in the muscles, and it tapers off after a couple weeks.

While adequate protein is a necessity, Ann Yelmokas McDermott, a physiologist and nutrition researcher at Tufts University, says that "Americans eat on average 50 percent more protein than they actually need." Even vegetarians, if they're eating a nutritious diet with lots of vegetables, usually have no problem meeting their protein needs.

The right foods can't make you buff, but they can help your energy levels. McDermott says it's important to eat a meal or snack within an hour or two of exercising to keep from getting fatigued during your next workout. Your muscles burn glycogen, a carbohydrate used for muscle energy. Afterward they need to replace those stores, and studies have found that eating a mix of protein and carbohydrates is the best way to refuel. McDermott recommends planning to keep a snack handy. Some good choices are yogurt and a piece of fruit, a smoothie or glass of lowfat milk, peanut butter on whole-grain bread, or hummus on a pita.

2) Lifting weights will make you less flexible.

We've all seen muscle-bound bodybuilders who look like they haven't touched their toes in years. But Frank Rife, director of fitness and wellness programs at UMass Amherst, says that building muscle doesn't necessarily mean sacrificing flexibility. "If you're stretching along with weight training, you don't have to lose range of motion," he says. It's important to include enough variety in your exercises; focusing just on your chest muscles, for instance, may cause your back to hunch over time. Rife recommends pairing opposites—chest press with rowing, sit-ups with lower back extensions, forward and backward leg lifts, for example. Always keep the weight low enough that you can execute each movement smoothly through the full range of motion. And follow every weightlifting session with stretches.

3) Doing yoga in a heated room gives you a better workout and releases toxins.

Many yoga practitioners swear by hot yoga, also called Bikram yoga, which takes place in a room where temperatures can soar well past 100 degrees. These sweaty sessions often leave people feeling like they had an intense workout, but experts say that feeling can be misleading.

"When we exercise, our blood vessels dilate in order to dissipate heat," says Gary Balady, director of preventive cardiology at Boston Medical Center. In hot conditions, vessels dilate even more and the heart has to pump faster to maintain blood pressure. But that higher heart rate doesn't translate into better fitness. To stay healthy, he says, "we want to protect the heart from working too hard."

McDermott also points out that hot yoga interferes with the body's natural cooling mechanism, the evaporation of sweat. "In a hot room, the perspiration doesn't dry out," she says, which further stresses the body. What about the idea that the extra sweat helps to release "toxins" from the body? McDermott calls this claim an old wives' tale. Sweat gets rid of water and salts, period. Any toxins are processed by your liver and kidneys and excreted in urine. Experts advise avoiding hot yoga if you're a beginner, are not physically fit or have a heart condition or diabetes. If you do practice it, take special care to stay hydrated.

4) If you have lower-back pain, skip your workout.

Back pain is a fact of life for many people, even those who are young and otherwise healthy. Peter Donohoe, owner of Focus Fitness in Boston, says that one of the biggest misconceptions he hears from clients is, "I have lower back pain, therefore I will do nothing." While serious pain or an injury may require rest, chronic back pain actually benefits from exercise, Donohoe says. Scientific research backs this up. A recent review of studies that examined the effect of exercise on chronic lower-back pain concluded that exercise is safe for people with lower-back pain, and that it can reduce pain and even lower the risk of future injuries.

Donohoe recommends getting up from the office chair and walking periodically, which takes pressure off the back and increases circulation to core muscles. Work with a certified personal trainer to find exercises that are safe and help relieve the pain. "A really good trainer can sometimes help identify the source of the injury," Donohoe adds. Exercises that test your stability and balance help to work muscles deep in the abdomen and back. These can be as simple as lifting your knee while balancing on one leg, or doing movements on a stability ball.

5) In weightlifting, lots of reps with low weight will "tone" your muscles.

Women have been told countless times to lift less weight to make their muscles "toned" without getting bulky. Maria Shea, regional fitness director at Healthworks, says the gym has made an effort to correct this myth in its clients. Most women, she says, just don't produce enough testosterone to bulk up.

To get stronger, you have to work a muscle to the point of fatigue, according to Westcott. That generally requires lifting about 60 to 90 percent of your maximum, and performing the movement anywhere between 5 and 15 times. You can vary the reps and weight, he says, as long as you're still reaching your limit.

Shea adds, "Women are looking for definition in their muscles when they're talking about toning. Strength training alone won't do that." Most women don't have sleek and sculpted muscles because the muscles are hiding under a layer of fat. And don't count on muscles to burn fat for you. It's true that muscle uses more energy than fat, and building muscle raises your metabolism. But "you have to put on four pounds of solid muscle to burn 100 calories a day," Shea says. "And that's a cookie." The only way to get rid of fat is by burning more calories than you take in, Shea says, and that requires cardiovascular activity.

6) Stretching before a workout reduces injuries.

Most trainers will say that stretching is the one part of a workout that too many people forget. But knowing the right timing and technique will help prevent injuries.

"There are two kinds of stretching," says Donohoe, "static stretching and dynamic stretching." Static stretching—holding a stretch for 15 to 20 seconds—has actually been shown in several recent studies to hinder performance and even raise the risk of injuries. Before exercising, Donohoe recommends that his clients instead perform dynamic stretches, which loosen the muscles by mimicking the motion of the exercise the body's about to do. They include swinging the arms backward and forward or pulling the leg into the body for a second or two and then releasing, repeating each movement several times. "Dynamic stretching is a way of preparing your muscles to perform work," he says.

Some trainers still recommend holding stretches before exercise, but only after a warmup. And static stretching is always critical after a workout, when your muscles are actually tighter, Donohoe says. "If you stretch, you'll be less sore the next day."

7) Watch the scale when you're trying to lose weight.

Whether we want to be healthier or just to look better in a pair of jeans, many of us are actively trying to lose weight. While monitoring your weight is important, many experts now say that the most important number to follow isn't just your weight, but your waistline.

For people looking to get healthier, "it's their body composition that's important, and where their weight's distributed," Gary Balady says. The real purpose of losing weight is to lose fat. Research has shown that fat is not just sitting there—it releases hormones, interferes with your body's normal metabolism and raises your risk of developing heart disease. Why is your waistline such a good measure? The abdominal fat that collects around the body's organs, called visceral fat, is thought to be more dangerous than the fat that collects under your skin. "It's the visceral fat that sends out signals to the body to do some very bad things," Balady says. A waist circumference of 40 or above in men and 35 and above in women is associated with a higher risk of health problems.

Your weight won't always tell you how much muscle versus fat you have. If you're getting fit to lose fat, you may gain weight even as your physique improves. Rife puts it more bluntly: "Scales are for fish." Rife recommends using your clothing as a guide: take a belt or a favorite pair of jeans that you can trust not to shrink, and see if they are getting looser. "If that's the case and your body weight hasn't changed," he says, "you're probably still getting some benefit." iB

OUR INTREPID REPORTER BARES ALL AT A SECRET CLASS IN CAMBRIDGE.

BY JONATHAN SOROFF PHOTOGRAPH BY ERIC ANTONIOU

According to my friend Joan, "Yoga is not a topic of conversation."

"It's great that you do it," she says. "Just don't talk about it. Because you know what you sound like to me? You sound like an idiot. It's boring. Nobody cares. So shut up, already."

She has a point. With yoga's popularity expanding like Kirstie Alley's pre-Jenny Craig waistline, a new sub-species has emerged, joining the Wine Bore, the Golf Bore and the Baby Bore in the pantheon of people you don't want to sit next to at a dinner party. And admittedly, I'm one of them. I've become a Yoga Bore.

When someone tells me they've suffered a financial set-back, my response is, "Do yoga." If someone says, "My cat died," I council, "Do yoga." Bunions? Meddling in-laws? Flatulence? Yoga. Yoga. Yoga.

But while terms like "ashtanga," "hatha," "vinyasa," "bikram," "chataranga" and "namaste" now come trippingly off the tongues of even the recently indoctrinated, there's one word that, when paired with yoga, piques everyone's curiosity, even Joan's. And that word is "naked." For five years, local periodicals have published an unobtrusive but eye-catching advertisement: Nude Yoga for Men in (where else but?) Cambridge. That's how I came to be standing, stark naked and sweating my proverbial balls off, in a dingy third-floor dance studio in Central Square, surrounded by other naked men who looked like they were playing a particularly vicious and masochistic game of Twister with themselves.

But I'm getting ahead of myself.

I should mention that I'll do almost anything on a dare, and attending nude yoga began that way. It started with a conversation last summer, when I mentioned to an acquaintance that my only tan line was from my wristwatch. I am habitually nude on the beach, or at least any beach that allows it, and I believe it's only the most idiotic sort of prudery and puritanical silliness that requires people to wear anything at all on a beach, since presumably you're there to swim and you're gonna get sand up your butt no matter what.

"So, you're a nudist," said the acquaintance.

"No, I'm not," I countered. "I don't want to mow the lawn naked. I don't want to cook bacon naked. I don't want to go skiing naked. I love clothing, and I consider cashmere a necessity. But there's no logical reason to wear anything on the beach."

"Well, I don't like nude beaches because the people who go to them are the last people in the world you'd want to see without clothing," said the acquaintance.

Which, to me, is the whole point. Decrepit old folks and morbidly obese people, walking around in the altogether? More power to 'em! I think it's great that they're comfortable in their own skins—sags, bags and unsightly wobbly bits included. Personally, I don't equate nudity with sex, and perhaps because of my upbringing in the natural-is-better '70s, I lack that embarrassment factor that would make me ashamed of appearing naked in public, however un-Adonis-like I may be (and getting more so by the decade). In short, I'd walk down Newbury Street naked; I just don't give a shit.

But as for nude yoga, my question was: Why?

What possible advantage could there be? It's not as if athletic clothing these days consists of whale bones and starched collars. How could my downward dog benefit from being in the buff, and does that really justify an intimate close-up of another man's anatomy, directly in front of me, in a similarly undignified position?

When my acquaintance dared me to attend the class, I decided to find out.

You can't just waltz into a nude yoga class unannounced, however, which is probably a good thing, since the world is full of people whose sole motive in seeing others unclothed is to file the image away in the Spank Bank. To prevent "tourists" (as the Web site diplomatically calls them), or pervs (as I would put it), potential participants are screened by the class organizers. For me, this consisted of a brief e-mail correspondence and a few phone calls in which I expressed my interest in the class and asked questions that had more to do with the style of yoga and logistics than whatever masculine scenery I might encounter.

Having satisfied them that I wasn't there to ogle, I was told the location, which is kept secret, presumably to discourage both the "tourists" and the sort of people with too much time on their hands who might be tempted to picket the class with signs saying things like, "God Hates Nude Yoga Fags." I was also e-mailed a set of guidelines and rules, which included the following:

This group is open to all naturist men regardless of sexual orientation. It is not about sex, cruising or voyeurism.

Those whose bodies are far from ideal are just as welcome as anyone else.

And, perhaps most importantly:

Members who feel attracted to others in the class do their best not to make it obvious to anyone during class. Spontaneous erections, if they occur, are treated as natural, involuntary and unremarkable and not taken personally; we simply continue our exercise without comment.

I didn't anticipate this last part posing any problem, as my expectation of the type of men most likely to take part tended toward unreconstructed hippies, unabashed exhibitionists and other boho archetypes that don't really fall within my dating pool. I was relieved to know, however, that on the off-chance that someone fancied me, unwelcome groping would not be tolerated.

On the appointed day, I drove to Central Square and located the unlit doorway that houses both the yoga studio and one of those wacky left-wing political organizations that earn Cambridge its well-deserved reputation as a hotbed of crackpots. There was something slightly odd about filing into a charmless room and peeling off all my clothing, but the only real awkwardness came when I unfurled my absurdly expensive yoga mat, which happens to be extra large—practically long enough to land a plane on.

"Wow," said a fellow classmate. "That's a really big one."

So, yes, the first thing I learned in nude yoga class is that size does matter.

The other men defied my expectations, insofar as I thought they'd all be typically unkempt Cantabrigians badly in need of some man-scaping. Yet most had at least a rudimentary grasp on grooming, and, in fact, on balance, it was an aesthetically pleasing crew…not that I was there to stare, or anything.

After settling in, we started with some warm-up exercises that felt somewhat strange (limbering up naked involves some disconcerting jiggling), but once the class began in earnest, the fact that we were nude became irrelevant. As the Web site quite accurately points out, when you're practicing yoga, you're generally looking at either the floor or the ceiling, rather than the person next to you.

In comparison to other yoga classes I've taken, this one was demanding, perhaps because it was all-male, and whether anyone cares to admit it, any group of men (whether they're buck naked or trussed up in business suits) is a seething miasma of testosterone. In fact, as un-yogic as that may be, the natural competitiveness between men made me work harder than I do when I'm surrounded by the Beacon Hill mommies at my gym.

Sue me if that's sexist.

The next hour and a half flew by in a blur of deep breathing and pretzel-like positions, and like most things that sound titillating in theory (porn, Las Vegas, Madonna's latest bid for attention), the nudity was utterly mundane. When it was over, I felt as if I'd had a strenuous workout in a Turkish bath.

Not surprisingly, a sense of camaraderie develops among people who have just spent an hour exerting themselves without any clothing on, and after class, one of the men said to me, "A bunch of us usually go out for Chinese food afterward. Care to join us?" The idea of trying to manipulate chopsticks with a group of guys whose Peking dumplings had just filled my peripheral vision didn't really appeal to me, so I declined, immediately regretting the decision. After all, wasn't I there to find out why these people did naked yoga in the first place?

So I went to a second session, determined to engage one of my classmates in prolonged conversation. This time, no one spoke to me at all, and everyone dispersed immediately after class. On the theory that even in baseball you get three strikes, I returned for a third class and this time hit pay dirt.

"So why did you come?" I asked one first-timer, who answered, "I'm trying to become more comfortable with my body."

Fair enough. "But why do yoga naked?" I persisted.

"Why not?" he replied.

Which, in the end, is pretty much the answer.

So is there any discernible advantage to doing yoga in the buff? Well, you're completely unfettered, and you can't cheat when it comes to the subtler modifications, and something about being naked helps to focus the mind inward, which is where it's supposed to be while practicing yoga.

That said, though, the greatest revelation I gleaned from the experience was this: Whether nude or clothed, the first place I start sweating is my scrotum.

That might not amount to enlightenment, but at least now I know not to blame it on my underwear. iB saving face

Partied too hardy this holiday season? Here's how to revive your look.

BY SAMANTHA HOUSE PHOTOGRAPHED BY TONY SCARPETTA

After the whirl of the holiday season—staying out late, chugging eggnog, eating rich little finger foods at the parties du jour and, in short, burning your bayberry-scented candle at both ends—there's a good chance that your skin's not at its dewiest right now. So how do you whip it back into shape?

For an immediate fix, makeup can conceal the damage. Because your face is as dehydrated as your body, start by slathering on the moisturizer. Less is more, however, when it comes to everything else you put on. Your face will dry out again during the day, and you don't want that caked-on look. So go light on the foundation, opting for sheer coverage. Skip the shimmery eyeshadows and blushes, too. With your drooping eyelids, you'll risk looking like someone socked you. Bright colors will only call attention to your tired features, so neutral shades are a better choice. And curling your lashes will help make your eyes look brighter and give the illusion that you're as awake and alert as you should be.

As for treating the problem and getting back to your perky best, here are a few remedies for what ails you.

FOR THE EYES:

1. OSCAR AND DEHN'S HANGOVER FROM HELL EYE MASK
Chill this mask in the fridge, and in an hour you'll have a soothing treat for your tired eyes that reduces puffiness. $14 at www.oscardehn.com.

2. LANCOME'S RENERGIE MICROLIFT EYE
This emergency treatment uses citrus and seaweed to firm and silica to reduce puffiness and brighten the delicate area around the eyes. $54 at Saks Fifth Avenue, Prudential Center, 617-262-8500.

AGREE TO AGREE, WITH EMOTION

Beyond Reason: Using Emotions as You Negotiate*, by Roger Fisher and Daniel Shapiro, brings useful new approaches to resolving disputes and reaching agreements.

Life is full of negotiations, from the momentously public to the intimately domestic. The office especially invites and demands agreements and compromises daily. Emeritus Harvard Law School professor Roger Fisher, co-author of Getting to Yes, and Daniel Shapiro, associate director of the Harvard Negotiation Project, have addressed an element that surrounds and underlies all of these interactions: emotion. But rather than simply explore the heat and light of anger, they have identified more fundamental factors, which they call "core concerns": appreciation, affiliation, autonomy, status and role. The book argues that in minding these factors, as they relate both to your own needs and to those of your counterpart, you can relax a defensive stance to explore possible resolutions. As you read the book, which deals with negotiations of all magnitudes, try imagining an issue of your own: Put yourself inside each category, and feel how liberating the power of these categories can be. By reframing disagreements away from "Growl! Ralph ordered the wrong number of units!" into a frank discussion that considers role and autonomy on both sides of the issue, a wider landscape emerges. Examples of international disputes brokered by Fisher make global matters intimate, tangible and applicable to your own yearnings for "Yes."

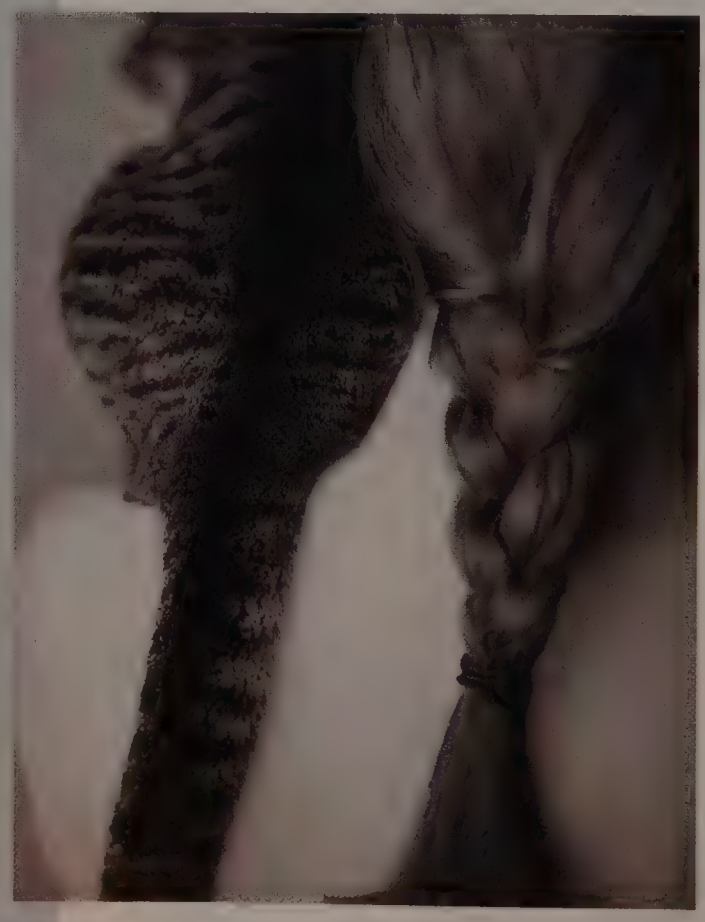
TRADITION AND WHIMSY

Bliss at 121 Newbury St. (617-421-5544; www.blisshome.com) sells wedding presents and more, including some funny toys.

Begun as a store that celebrated wedding presents (in less-than-department-store-enormity), Bliss is settling into the married life. Its formal and pretty plates can be bought in any number (some stores demand five), and they encourage mixing and matching. The whitest plates are Limoges, often with colorful rims, but it's interesting to see them almost matched with slightly grayer German porcelain or with Wedgwood bone china, variety that adds shop-like charm to your house. The same goes for the St. Louis crystal glasses, some see-through, others with complexly textured facets in various colors. Items here are never simply utilitarian. Comic/chic Alessi turns corkscrews into cheerful little people and funnels into Pinocchio, and manipulates twigs of stainless steel into a "Blow Up" basket that holds fruit in a loose embrace. And see John Derian's plates decorated with hauntingly beautiful découpage birds. A huge, crinkled-tinfoil piggy bank is plugged with a cork. For the honeymoon, perhaps, some durable wheeled bags with deep, secret pockets and a soft front compartment that expands (ge pregnant?) with the stuff inside, as most such bags do not. Quite stable, they are built to counterba ance that plumpness.

STILL LIFE WITH CAT, LIVE WIRE WITH GROOM

Mim Adkins (617-233-9057; www.mimspeak.com) is a photographer who specializes in cats and weddings.



There may be a kind of overlap b tween weddings (affection, humo affinities and proximities) and owne in love with their cats. Mim Adkins, photographer of both, brings out tho parallels. Much of her black-and-whi feline oeuvre juxtaposes herself or friend with one or both of her ow beautifully detailed tiger cats. Her po trait "Tale of Two," shot from behin makes the subjects appear as de friends with slightly different hairdo prettily proximate. In another photo friend holds her two cats, Romeo ar Rowser, like giant, furry mitten Sometimes she "molds them like piec of a puzzle." Even an incomplete pie of woman or cat—a paw caressing face, suggesting a whispered secret; t feathery hair of her bangs near kitt intricate stripes—can speak volumes intimacy and sweetness. You can ord any of these, or pose for a session wi your own fond Felix. Mim's weddi pictures—sometimes black-and-whi with roses or umbrellas in red—sho similar melody and merriment: a ne lywed couple captured crossing a street, or a bride frolicking on the beach with her bridesmaids i leaning, hugging bundle.

REVIEW

STANDS AND DELIVERS

Eclano adds a culinary kick to the North End's Salem Street.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY ANTHONY TIEULI

People frequently ask how I decide which restaurants to review. The most important factor is word of mouth: My friends and colleagues constitute a far-flung network of scouts, ever alert, who report back to me on new restaurants they have tried or heard about. Word of Eclano came to me from one of my law partners by way of her hairdresser, who had heard about it from the sister of a friend. The tip was a good one, since this new entrant in the crowded North End restaurant scene shows merit and promise.

Eclano occupies a storefront on the west side of Salem Street, near Cross. The space is simple and straightforward: A bar sits to the left of the entrance, while on the right a dining room seats just over 50 at tables dressed with crisp white tablecloths and furnished with sturdy oak chairs and vinyl-covered banquettes. The dark woodwork of the bar is echoed in wooden paneling below wainscoting, with pale yellow walls above. Small sconces and tiny votive candles provide minimal light that makes reading the menu difficult. Music during three visits included opera, Sinatra, jazz and rock—eclectic, to say the least.

The complimentary starters signaled the kitchen's commitment to serious dining. A small bowl of assorted olives included luscious kalamatas alongside huge green, black and brown varieties, all swimming in a small pool of slightly briny olive oil. The olive oil did not last long once the delicious slices of warm, crusty bread arrived.

With my appetite held at bay by bread and olives, I attacked Eclano's inviting menu with gusto. An order of house-made rabbit sausage ($11) brought a coil of robustly flavored sausage, charred on the outside and moist and tender within. Uncoiled it would have measured at least a foot, and together with its accompaniment of tender, garlicky sautéed broccoli rabe, it made a satisfying small meal in itself. House-made mustard with large seeds that popped when bitten added a particularly savory and tactilely engaging note. Another substantial appetizer, the grilled pizzette ($10), came dressed with sweet caramelized onions, creamy, slightly sharp and tangy goat cheese, and smoked tomatoes on a crisp crust. The interplay of tangy, sweet and smoky flavors proved especially delightful. Semolina gnocchi ($8), listed with the appetizers rather than the pastas, turned out to be a single, round pillow of light, almost ethereal pasta, two inches in diameter and three-quarters of an inch high, dressed in a luscious, smooth tomato sauce with fresh basil leaves and a thin crisp slice of baked Parmesan cheese—nothing like the small, dense potato-pasta spheroids usually billed as gnocchi.

Following these three triumphs, the cacciuco bianco ($14) was doubly disappointing. The priciest appetizer on the menu, this stew of prawns and cockles suffered from slightly mealy prawns and clams that were clearly past their prime, with an off-putting texture that was soft and crumbly. (I wondered whether the subpar quality of shellfish resulted from the unavailability of fresh supplies the weekend following Thanksgiving.)

Pasta courses included spectacular pappardelle with sautéed mushrooms ($16). Its three distinctive fungi—hedgehog, hen-of-the-woods and oyster mushrooms—delivered a variety of woodsy, otic flavors and first-rate texture. T long, broad strands of fresh pasta, cook to al dente perfection, and the truf oil–scented sauce made the dish a star out. Hand-cut tagliatelle ($17) toss with a ragout of lamb, peas and ricot while not quite reaching the heights the pappardelle, proved a hearty, me offering. The substantial chunks of lam identified as coming from Colorado a so mild to me that they could have be mistaken for beef, made the preparati seem much like a Provençal daube, t rich, meaty stew of southern France th often accompanies pasta.

With appetizers and pastas as substa tial as Eclano provides, you might tempted to stop short of the ma courses. Don't. The roasted veal tend loin ($29) was as good as I have tast anywhere, with medallions of rare, me in-the-mouth veal accompanied sautéed portobello and oyster mus rooms. The pleasures of the extraordin ily flavorful sauce, made from the redu tion of the cooking juices of both ve and mushrooms, lingered long after it w gone. Only slightly less enjoyable th the veal tenderloin was the Long Isla duck breast ($25), slow-roasted with bla figs and served on a plate with swirls aged balsamic. A thin layer of pleasan salty fat and skin imparted maximum f vor to the rare, tender slices of duck.

So good were the veal and duck tha decided to push my luck by returning to the beef. This was a mistake, as the grill filet ($26) reaffirmed an old prejudice mine that, except for Tuscany's highly garded biftek Fiorentina, beef is not medium in which Italian kitchens exc Eclano's filet was coarse in texture, a neither juicy nor flavorful. The proble may have been the sauce of red wine, sh lots and gorgonzola, a combination th not only did not work in itself but a overwhelmed whatever flavor the b might have had. The garnish of a sin yellow carrot and a handful of slend green beans, both of which arrived on t undercooked side, showed little charact is confection boasted satiny texture and ich, mellow sweetness that was comple- ented by a marvelous, sweet-tart blue- rry sauce. Eclano's flourless chocolate ke ($10), a credible (if pricey) exemplar an old standby, came topped with a huge op of chocolate gelato.

Eclano offers a reasonable selection of nes, including some by the glass. aVinci Chianti ($7) made a good food ne, its fruitiness accompanied by de- nt acidity. A glass of an old Sicilian fa- rite, Corvo ($7), was fuller-bodied but ll dry and well-structured. Best, and un- rstandably more expensive, the Chianti nsi Riserva ($35) combined the entic- g bouquet of sangiovese with good fla- r and balance.

Service at Eclano aspired to luxury and inement. Our earnest waiter (the same every visit) proved attentive and active, replacing tableware at the drop a hat, professionally crumbing the le between courses and bringing a fin- r bowl following the shellfish appetizer. y one quibble was the decision, on my st two visits, to recite the nightly spe- ls without mentioning their cost. nce these prices were inevitably higher an those of items on the menu, some- times substantially so, this practice—one certainly not limited to Eclano—can be more than a minor annoyance. (On the third visit, he did announce the prices of the specials when describing them.)

If I could make only one change at Eclano, it would be to banish mashed potatoes from the kitchen. With tedious predictability, both the veal and the duck came settled on top of a mashed potato platform, and the filet would have suffered the same fate had I not asked the waiter to hold the mash. Don't get me wrong; I'm a fan of mashed potatoes. But they need not serve as the foundation of every dish, imparting their mushy texture and starchy flavor to whatever fish, fowl or meat arrives plopped on top of them.

With courses appropriately labeled antipasti, primi and secondi, Eclano gets it right on menu terminology. More importantly, with the superb pastas, veal and panna cotta turned out by its kitchen, Eclano shines on the culinary front. Tourists may still flock to Hanover Street, but spots like Eclano (and its neighbor across the street, Neptune Oyster, featured in the last issue) are putting Salem Street on the map. iB

No Luck for Lucy's

Lucca's ex-chef sets up shop in Wellesley… Lucy's closes…

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

What's a city chef like Frank Santonastaso, who put Lucca on the map in the North End, hinking when he opens his own restaurant n suburban Wellesley?

"I really didn't want to open a restaurant n the city," he says. "There are way too nany restaurants already, too much compe-ition." Basically, it's about supply and de-nand: Boston has lots of Italian eateries, whereas in Wellesley, Santonastaso feels his Vela Restaurant is original. What's more, he chef/owner is seeing many of the same aces in the dining room from his four-year enure at Lucca: "There's a lot of overlap. 'm surprised." Part of the appeal, he con-edes, is the ease of driving to and parking at is Wellesley Hills location. However, "a lot of people] still go to Lucca, and [many of hem] tell me it's still their favorite."

Making the move to suburbia didn't re-quire that Santonastaso "dumb down the nenu," either. "People are really educated n food out here," he says. "Everything is nade in-house: breads, soups, stocks, the asta, desserts. … We even butcher our own neat." That includes the braised boar in the xtra-thick bolognese sauce.

Is there any downside to the location? "In he suburbs, it's harder to find waitstaff," he cknowledges. Nevertheless, some Vela pa-rons have visited "10 times already" in the estaurant's first three months. And San-onastaso's willing to accommodate his pa-rons, whether by fulfilling a request for luten-free pasta or splitting an entrée at no harge.

Chef Frank Santonastaso took his act to the suburbs with Vela.

From piece of cake to Case of pique: Turns out Greg Case, former Hamersley's pastry chef, won't be going ahead with the Cambridge café project you read about in this column a few weeks ago. Instead, he says, "A better business partner has stepped forward. We're putting together a business plan and seeking a location. It will have lots of stuff from the Central Square concept, as I was so excited about that menu, but this will focus more on being a prepared-food store for takeout and home entertaining." We'll keep you posted.

Elsewhere in Central Square, Dylan Black has been granted a liquor license and is eager to take over the Green Street Grill from former owner John Clifford after the venue closes Jan. 8. "[Chef] Mark Romano and I are shooting for about the first week in February" to re-open, says Black. … In Boston, No. 9 Park bartender Ryan McGrale has been named one of the five "Leaders of the American Cocktail Revolution" in the January issue of Food & Wine. Clinching the honor was McGrale's "Ultimate Mojito."

Finally, Andy Husbands, owner of Tremont 647, Sister Sorel and Rouge will headline the fourth annual St. Louis Food & Wine Experience on the weekend of Jan. 28-29. This Missouri spectacle is in the city whose denizens invented deep-fried ravioli and made sheep's brain sandwiches a signature local delicacy. Best washed down, perhaps, with a glass of Mutton-Rothschild. IB t wasn't the picky Brookline clientele, or a ad business climate, or a tempting new usiness venture that convinced Lucy's wner Mitzi Kaitz to sell her Coolidge Cor-er restaurant late last month. Instead, says Kaitz, it was the "restaurant lifestyle" that rowded out any semblance of a normal so-ial life. "I haven't had a Saturday night to myself in three years," she says. As you read his, Kaitz will be compensating for years of eprivation by driving her hot new convert-ble cross-country to California, with Desi, er terrier-mix, riding shotgun. "My goal is o drive through the whole West Coast and lay golf in each state," she says. "I'll be one art of Thelma & Louise!"

Lucy's old home, under new ownership, s closed for renovations until further no-ice. Stay tuned for details.

Grenache's Got Panache

BY SANDY BLOCK, M.W.

Boy, that grenache grape don't get no respect. None. Either you never know it's there, because they stick another more popular name on the label, or the few times you notice it, it tastes so boring you don't want to go back for a second sip, no matter how thirsty you are. But I've got news for you: that's just bad grenache, and it's usually pink in color. Its destiny is to be red and when it's done right the wine verges on greatness. Whether it's part of a blend or pure varietal, grenache is probably wine's next budding superstar. And if you think pinot noir is a misunderstood red wine par excellence for the ultra-sensitive, discerning palate of anyone with halfway cultivated taste (meaning anyone like myself and all of you), grenache is so obscure it's got pinot noir beat hands down.

So why the bad rep? First, grenache isn't even the grape's real name. Everything may sound better in French, but this is one grape that originated elsewhere, across the Pyrenees, as what the Spanish call garnacha. And especially in Rioja, Spain's flagship wine district, this is a grape that's treated as nothing more than a filler for the supposedly nobler, more aromatic tempranillo. That's another part of the problem with grenache: it's such a polite, well-behaved partner for other grapes that have more surface charms and more dominant personalities (like syrah and mourvedre in France's Rhone Valley) that you rarely even know it's there. And then, because it tends to have a lighter skin pigmentation (like pinot noir) there's the tendency to turn it into a rosé. Grenache's low tannins, mild fruitiness and soft acidity can make most red wines light and insipid. Finally, in California they've been ripping the vines out of the vineyard at a breakneck pace, which is never good for a grape's reputation. Apparently, no one wants to use grenache anymore because they're so busy competing to make syrah, pinot noir and merlot. So at a time when red wine consumption has been expanding dramatically, there's less than half the acreage of grenache planted there compared to 10 years ago, when it was the third most widely planted red grape rather than the ninth.

So how come almost everyone's wrong? Because the taste of a grenache-based wine, like the taste of pinot noir and riesling, directly reflects where you grow it, how old the vines are and how much tonnage you harvest from the vineyard. Meaning, if you over crop, the wine is thin and diluted. If you grow it on meager hillsides, if the vines are old and shy-bearing, if you get some concentration, you've got something wonderful. But what's the incentive when no one seems to care?

It's that there are grape growers and winemakers all over the globe whose passion is to produce something excellent, interesting and unique. They search the aforementioned old vineyards; and rather than being deterred by the grapes' low tonnage these vineyards are able to eke out, they're intrigued. Scattered throughout the world, in southern France, in Spain, in Australia and in California, there are old stumpy grenache vines producing grapes to make these winemakers salivate.

My first encounter with grenache greatness was an Australian wine from the D'Arenberg winery in McLaren Vale. With the quirky name "The Custodian," it was made, according to the label, from vines as old as 120 years. Rather than the usual five or six tons per acre, these vines yielded less than half a ton, and you could taste it. It was so dark I couldn't believe it was grenache. The flavors were memorable: syrupy, concentrated black cherry and mocha, with smoky herbal, peppery and floral essences wafting out of the glass.

Soon after that, I discovered Priorat, a highly fashionable region in northeastern Spain that produces amazing old vine garnacha on its mountainous black slate soils. And still later, the more reasonably priced, less cultish wines from a lower elevation denomination called Montsant that are often almost equally as luscious. The Southern Rhone Valley, many of whose winemakers seemed always to be searching for grapes to add that would "improve" the region's ubiquitous grenache, has once again embraced the quality potential of the pure varietal. The next wine I tasted that bowled me over was another 100 percent grenache: Chateauneuf du Pape "Barbe Rac" from Chapoutier, made from over 90-year-old vines, is spectacularly rich and powerful.

The only problem with all of these fabulous wines: they're fabulously expensive. That's why discovering the Trevor Jones "Boots" Red, a grenache from Australia, was such a revelation. The current 2002 vintage is a marvel of ripe, plummy fruit concentration, lush texture, and long, spicy, chocolate-like finish. Again we're dealing with old vines, in this case over 70-years old, but at a price (about $15) that's almost a joke compared to the quality. It's so smooth you can enjoy sipping it solo, but it's got so much depth and perfume, with such minimal tannin, that it would fit beautifully with a lamb stew, a grilled tuna steak or a spicy chili-influenced dish. It's the kind of wine that you can't help but respect when you taste it. IB

Music: Camper Comeback

Their name might scream classical yawnfest, but their music is pure punk, and on Jan. 13, '80s rockers Camper Van Beethoven bring their musical stylings to the Middle East in Central Square. The group got its start in Santa Cruz, Calif., in 1983 when boyhood friends David Lowery, Chris Molla and Chris Pedersen joined Victor Krummenacher (guitar) and Jonathan Segel (violin, keyboard), releasing their debut Telephone Free Landslide Victory in 1985. Over the next four years, the band produced four more albums (including two under the Virgin Records label) before breaking up in 1990. In 2002, they resurfaced with the previously unreleased Tusk (a song-by-song cover of the Fleetwood Mac album), which had been recorded in 1987. The temptation for a reunion then became too strong to ignore. In 2004, the comeback became official with the release of New Roman Times, and they've been back on tour ever since, for what we can only call Camper Van Beethoven's Second. Middle East, 472 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-931-2000). www.mideastclub.com. 8 pm. $20. —R.L.

THROUGH SUN./JAN. 22

Performing Arts: African-American Culture

This month, the BCA's Calderwood Pavilion plays host to the 2006 African American Theatre Festival, presented by the Jamaica Plain–based Our Place Theatre Project, with a compelling line-up of performances. Rhythm of the People, which runs through Jan. 15, is a celebration of African-American culture with African dance, song and skits. The show features scenes from George C. Wolfe's The Last Mama on the Couch and The Hair Piece and Phillip Hayes Dean's Sty of the Blind Pig, as well as poetry readings by U-Meleni and Darius Williams. Williams also directs the festival's second show, the world premiere of Dark as a Thousand Midnights, running Jan. 11–22. The play, written by Jacqui Parker, examines the racial climate in Mississippi in the aftermath of the 1955 murder of Emmet Till. For a complete performance schedule, go to www.bostontheatrescene.com. Calderwood Theatre Pavilion, Boston Center for the Arts, 539 Tremont St., Boston (617-933-8600). $28–$42.50. —R.L.

FRI./JAN. 13–FRI./APRIL 7

Tastings: Wine Time

If any of your New Year's resolutions involve cutting back your booze intake, stop reading right now. The Boston Wine Festival is back in town at the Boston Harbor Hotel. On Jan. 13, the celebration of all things wine kicks off its 17th year with the grand-opening reception, a walk-around event showcasing the wide array of wines to be featured over the course of the festival, accompanied by fare from Meritage chef Daniel Bruce. Throughout the winter, events will come fast and furious; by the time April rolls around, the hotel will have played host to more than 50 wine-themed events, including the Battle of the Cabernets, Meritage Madness, Super Tuscans and the Rising Stars dinner. Ticket prices range from $70 to $310 depending on the event. For a complete list of events and prices, see www.bostonwinefestival.net. —R.L.

Museums & Galleries: Get Satisfaction

For those who missed the chance to meet Rolling Stones guitarist Ronnie Wood and see his artwork at Newbury Fine Arts last summer, rejoice: You've got another chance. On Jan. 12, the gallery hosts a public art sale and party to display the musician's most recent works. Not only are there complimentary wine and appetizers for the evening event, but anyone who purchases one of his pieces is invited to attend a VIP party with the rockstar himself at a later date. Unlike the paintings for sale during the summer, which focused on celebrities Wood has met or performed with, this collection, titled Range, touches on a variety of subjects that reflect Wood's personal life. Prices run between $850 and $10,000, and limited-edition packages of four signed prints go for $4,000. If you prefer browsing to buying, you can stop by the gallery from 10 am–6 pm, Monday–Saturday, and 12–5 pm on Sundays through Jan. 27. *Newbury Fine Arts, 29 Newbury St., Boston (617-536-0210). www.newburyfinearts.com. The Matador does a lively dance with death.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

With a movie like The Matador in the can, it's no wonder Pierce Brosnan told the 007 producers to keep their gadgets to themselves, thank you very much. The next Bond movie likely won't match the creative energy of Richard Shepard's dark comedy, so who needs to play an old Cold Warrior whose current escapades feel warmed over?

Then again, you sense Brosnan never took the "man's man" quality of Bond very seriously. He spoofed it in The Tailor of Panama (while still under contract to portray Her Majesty's secret servant), and he does it again here. Julian Noble, his character in The Matador, travels to as many exotic destinations and has as much indiscriminate sex as Bond, but unlike the spiffy spy, Julian looks and feels hollow after years of gallivanting with nowhere to call home.

Noble is a hit man, well-paid to fly into a city, get the latest assignment from his contact (Philip Baker Hall) and then eliminate his target—usually a corporate executive a rival company wants out of the way. We learn the last tidbit when Julian tells it to Danny Wright (Greg Kinnear) in Mexico City, where each man is travelling on business. Danny, a decent Denver businessman desperate to stop a losing streak in life, is essentially Julian's opposite: Julian is a slut, Danny married his high-school sweetheart (Hope Davis); Julian rolls with the punches, Danny takes them personally; Julian sees how crooked the world is, Danny still thinks hard work and a job well done get rewarded.

So it's no surprise the two don't hit it off at the start. Danny can't handle the racy double entendres Julian hurls his way when they first meet, and he really can't handle it when, after dodging the question "So, what do you do for a living?" a half-dozen times, Julian reveals that he is a "facilitator of fatalities." Skeptical, Danny asks Julian how he would hypothetically dispatch one of their fellow spectators at a bullfight, and Julian nearly has the guy dead and gutted by the time Danny begs him to stop the "show and tell."

Danny is half-scared, half-fascinated by Julian. The fear takes over when Julian offers Danny $50,000 to help on a job by creating a distraction in the street. Danny refuses, but when the pair leave Mexico City on the outs, there's a hint that more has happened than we've been told.

Fast-forward to six months later, after a burnt-out Julian has botched a job and is now the target of his former employers, who won't let him simply retire. He shows up in the middle of the night at Danny's house, drunk and calling Danny his only friend. Julian learns that Danny hasn't told his wife everything about his trip to Mexico City, and as Julian reminds Danny that he owes him for what happened in Mexico, the details are revealed to the audience in flashback.

I thought I knew exactly where the flashback was going, but it was a pleasant surprise to see the withheld Mexico scene bond Julian and Danny in unexpected ways. Their friendship rekindled, the movie shifts into caper gear for its climax, as Julian gets Danny to help him out on a new assignment that he says will wipe his slate clean with those trying to kill him.

The blend of rowdy comedy, middle-aged blues and fun thrills makes The Matador an unusual mix, but one that writer-director Shepard handles well. He's been making low-budget movies for more than a decade, some bad (The Linguini Incident) and some good (Oxygen, with Adrien Brody and Maura Tierney), but The Matador's his first theatrical release in Boston. It's a step up in class from his previous efforts, thanks largely to fine performances from Brosnan and Kinnear, who let us see the vulnerable people behind their characters' surfaces. Davis also does well with a more playful character than her recent stick-in-the-mud roles in Proof and The Weather Man.

The mix of crime and comedy places The Matador firmly in Elmore Leonard territory, and though it lacks the personality and laugh count of the best Leonard adaptations (Out of Sight and Get Shorty), it holds its own. It's certainly a better trip to faux-Leonard territory for Brosnan than After the Sunset, and it's a nice bit of holiday-season counterprogramming, in the tradition of Scream, Galaxy Quest and Bad Santa. In other words, The Matador is an unpretentious comedy offering an alternative to the award-hungry and holiday-fuzzy leftovers clogging the multiplex. iB

Breakfast on Pluto ★★★½
Cillian Murphy (28 Days Later, Batman Begins) his most vibrant performance yet as Patrick "K Brady, an Irish orphan on a picaresque jo through the 1960s and 1970s. It's a journey inv a disgruntled foster mother (Ruth McCabe), a orthodox priest (Liam Neeson), the IRA, a (Liam Cunningham), a glam-rock singer (Gavi day), a magician (Stephen Rea) and Kitten's e birth mother (Eva Birthistle), among others. collaborating with author Patrick McCabe, whom he made 1997's The Butcher Boy, Neil J conjures up another black-comic tribute to indi alism and finding your own path in life. Lik Butcher Boy, his latest has great affection for in uals, but trouble with people in organized gr whether it's the IRA, the Catholic Church o other group stifling individual expression. The r also gets great mileage out of a soundtrack of T from the period, even squeezing drama from F Goldsboro's syrupy "Honey," clearly the best matic use of a goofy pop song since "Tiny Danc Almost Famous. (At Kendall Square.)

Brokeback Mountain ★★★
Ang Lee's "gay cowboy movie" turns out to be emotional and less sensational than you migh pect. It's a 20-plus-year tale of two young cow (Heath Ledger, Jake Gyllenhaal) put together summer ranching job in 1963, who fall for each despite saying they're "not queer." As each retur his separate life, eventually involving an unsatis marriage for each man, they reconnect in a secr lationship during "fishing trips" on the mou where they once herded sheep. Whenever the o tunity arises to live together and start a ranch the next 20 years, one's fear of being found thwarts the relationship from going further. The result is a sad tale of frustration, self-censorship life together that never was, intimately told, wit villains beyond those societal forces inhibiting two men. Ledger's performance as the close-mou cowpoke we see most can be mannered, but earthy restraint of the movie—in its staging an tight focus on its characters—adds to its effect melancholy mood. (At Boston Common, Har Square, Coolidge Corner and suburbs.)

The Family Stone ★½
Writer-director Thomas Bezucha's previous Big was as bland as beets. If your indie movie is bland has a "Hollywood ending," your first studio mov not likely to be any more interesting, and Bezu isn't. Full of forced humor and unsubtle drama holiday movie struggles to do anything right, desp cast that includes Sarah Jessica Parker, Luke Wi and Rachel McAdams. The first plays a high-st New Yorker thrown into the holiday celebratio the family home of her boyfriend (Dermot Mulro It seems as if half the gags are about her being unc fortable, but who wouldn't feel uneasy around t overbearing, self-righteous drips? About the only sistently funny thing is that Amherst native Bezu seems to think his titular family—which incluc professor, a film editor, a school teacher and a gay racial couple—is an example of liberal enlightenm Yet this clan is practically the epitome of a red-sta stereotypes about the overeducated, intolerant, lib elite. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Fun with Dick & Jane ★★½
From a creative standpoint, remaking a generally gotten movie like this makes more sense than ren ing King Kong. Not that this is likely to be one of Carrey's more memorable movies, but writers J Apatow and Nicholas Stoller cleverly update the 1 tale of a financially strapped suburban couple t takes to armed robbery, making Carrey an employe an Enron-like company that crashes and burns, w the higher-ups making off like bandits and the ra and-file losing jobs, stock investments and pensi Carrey plays one such palooka (he's promoted to of communications solely to be the public face of company on the day it tanks), Tea Leoni is his w (who's quit her job just in time for the family cri and Alec Baldwin is funny as the two-faced comp CEO who's one-half Kenneth Lay, one-half Du and all charlatan. The action is never more th mildly amusing, but the results are still better than pected. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs

King Kong ★★★
Peter Jackson's remake will never replace the inv tive original, but it clearly has more to offer than 1976 remake. Retaining the early-1930s setting, Ja son turns Merian C. Cooper's 1933 thriller into often thrilling, sometimes bloated succession of pieces, as a movie producer full of ideas (Jack Bla takes stars (Naomi Watts, Kyle Chandler), a scre vriter (Adrien Brody) and a crew to find "undiscovered" Skull Island and film an adventure movie. Not only do they find the island and its natives, they also ind the supersized title character (rendered in impressively expressive CGI), who takes a shine to the actress. Some of the best sequences replicate the original—including Kong's battle with a T. Rex (three of hem, in this case) and the scene in which he shakes umans off a tree-trunk bridge to their deaths. Jackson lso adds seat-squirming action with monstrous reepy-crawlies and huge worms. The story pushes the omance between Watts' actress and Brody's writer too ard, and the climactic, top-of-the-Empire-State-uilding sequence drags on, but the production design nd visual effects in the New York scenes are dazzling nd, as in Cooper's version, Black's character becomes surrogate for the filmmaker, with Jackson poking fun t his ballsy but insincere showman. (At Boston Comon, Fenway and suburbs.)

Match Point ★★½

fter making predominantly unfunny comedies for he last decade, Woody Allen has shown some smarts y making his first drama since 1989's Crimes and Misemeanors, with which this ultimately bears some milarity. It also shakes up Allen's predictable routine y being set in London and not having a character ho's just an Allen surrogate. The protagonist this me is a tennis instructor (Jonathan Rhys Myers) ho falls in with a wealthy family, ultimately marryg into it and becoming a well-paid cog in the family siness. But his affair with an American actress Scarlett Johansson) whom he loves more than his ife (Emily Mortimer) threatens his cushy new festyle, and he's forced to choose between love and mfort. It's well-acted and generally involving, and inctuated by opera arias that I'm sure have more relvance to those who know what's being played out in em (alas, I'm not one of those people). The trouble that the wheels turn very slowly in the drama, and llen, whose comedies are at least short and snappy, ags this out to an unnecessary 125 minutes that acally seem longer. (At Kendall Square.)

Mrs. Henderson Presents ★★

very once in a while, director Stephen Frears (The rifters, Dirty Pretty Things) lays a generic egg. He's ne it here with a based-on-truth period piece out the title character (Judi Dench), a bored, thy-rich, late-1930s widow who, on a whim, buys closed London theater, hires an equally cantankerus showman (Bob Hoskins) to run it and ends up tting on the first nude revue in England. Although the story sounds racy, it's more in line with aint English comedies like 2003's Calendar Girls an with Showgirls. In other words, it's all very steful, and the comedy verges on the cute. The ory is never actually bad, it's just never very interting—the characters are one-dimensional and beuse they never deepen, everything remains shalw, especially the repeated bickering between Mrs. and her theater manager. (At Kendall Square.)

Munich ★★★

Saving Private Ryan, Steven Spielberg opened th a horrific battle sequence, then spent the rest of e movie trying to convince you the ideals of orld War II justified that carnage. His latest takes more somber approach to the effects of violence, pecially on those who inflict it. Eric Bana stars as Israeli soldier who, following the kidnapping and urder of Israeli Olympic participants at the 1972 mmer games in Munich, is recruited to head a vert squad designed to find and assassinate the lestinians who planned the Olympic Village atck. The early action feels odd, as it has you rooting r the team (also including characters played by niel Craig and Ciaran Hinds) to kill people—escially odd since the film withholds most of the ympic violence until later flashbacks. Still, the ovie functions as a well-oiled, globetrotting riller full of nail-biting sequences, and the movie's nse of right and wrong, good and bad, isn't as fixed it initially seems. As the squad leader gets deeper to the shadow world in which any ally might be an emy, and in which helpful friends might have hidn agendas that aren't very friendly, he begins to estion the value of fighting violence with vioence. Does his violence just create more enemies? es it really make him safer from attack? Whether s is meant as a commentary on the current "war terror" is debatable, but it's certainly food for ought. Aside from one very dubious piece of edit—in which Spielberg intercuts the final flashck of Olympic tragedy with a sex scene—this is id, thoughtful stuff from Spielberg, a step up from t summer's War of the Worlds. (At Boston Comn, Fenway and suburbs.)

The New World ★★

ere's effective cinematic storytelling, and there's effective cinematic storytelling. A love story in ich the two lovers talk ceaselessly in voice-overs, but very little in dialogue to each other—as happens in Terrence Malick's latest—falls with a splat into the ineffective category. Like The Thin Red Line, the 1998 World War II drama that marked the once-revered director's return to film, this early-17th-century tale of the settlement of Jamestown and the relationship between Captain John Smith (Colin Farrell) and Pocahontas (Q'orianka Kilcher) has such a languorous pace that the action never quite gets involving. It's interesting to have a more adult telling of the same story Disney polished up in Pocahontas, but, because of the lovers' communication gap, Malick never gets across what bonds the lead characters besides their hot bods. Instead of a dreamy, passionate tale of European and Native-American cultures colliding, this often seems more like a really long, slow Abercrombie & Fitch ad, and I'm not buying. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

New York Doll ★★★

Bassist Arthur "Killer" Kane was the odd man out when pre-punk legends the New York Dolls broke up in 1975. The other four members paired off for separate projects, but all of Kane's post-Dolls bands quickly fizzled, and he descended into drunken poverty and regret. He eventually converted to Mormonism and settled into a part-time job at the Mormon Temple's Family History Center in Los Angeles. Greg Whiteley's compact but affecting documentary chronicles Kane's unglamorous daily life in L.A. and his preparations for the Dolls' longshot 2004 reunion show in London. Less sensational and more genuinely emotional than any episode of Behind the Music, it offers a fitting tribute to the mild-mannered man still adjusting to life after rock and roll. (At Coolidge Corner.)

The Producers ★★½

Mel Brooks' 1968 original telling of two producers who hope to make a mint off of a Broadway flop—by overfinancing the short-lived show and running off with the extra money—has more laughs than this remake, despite being 45 minutes shorter. And with its musical-within-a-movie, the original already had three memorable songs. So this movie version of the 2001 stage musical, with Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick reprising their theater roles, is a case of more being less. Typically, Lane and Broderick imitate, respectively, Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder from the 1968 version. Lane fares better than Broderick, but in roles expanded from the original, Gary Beach (as the tacky director the producers hire) and Roger Bart (as his catty assistant) steal the movie. Occasionally a song will break through, like Lane's "Betrayed," and Uma Thurman and Will Ferrell are fine as new additions to the cast, but the update still pales next to the original. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Ringer ★★½

Anyone who's seen a Farrelly brothers movie knows the Rhode Island siblings love to present the mentally and physically challenged with a full range of emotions few movies allow such characters. In this story of a desperately debt-ridden guy (Johnny Knoxville) who pretends to be retarded in order to fix the Special Olympics, the mentally handicapped are much more than victims. They aren't so gullible, and some of them are even co-conspirators in the scheme. Parts of the plot travel on automatic pilot, including Knoxville's character falling for a Special Olympics volunteer (Katherine Heigl) who thinks he's retarded. But like the usual Farrelly brothers production, sweetness tempers what might have been tasteless. Directed by Barry Blaustein—writer of a half-dozen so-so Eddie Murphy comedies and director of 1999's wrestling documentary Beyond the Mat—this has about a 50-50 mix of actors and mentally challenged people playing the competitors, and another tasty performance by Brian Cox (Manhunter, Adaptation) as the unscrupulous uncle who sets up the fix. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Syriana ★★★

Traffic writer Stephen Gaghan makes his debut as writer-director in this drama that essentially takes the same approach to the oil business as the earlier movie did to the drug trade—by looking at the intersection of business, politics and crime. There are a wide variety of characters and locations here, and through much of the first hour you pine for a scorecard to keep everyone and everything straight in your head: There's a CIA field agent (George Clooney) popping back and forth between Washington and the Middle East, a Saudi-like emirate full of palace intrigue, two Texas oil companies trying to merge, a D.C. lawyer (Jeffrey Wright) the oil companies hire to fend off the Department of Justice, an expatriate American energy analyst (Matt Damon) who becomes an adviser to the more progressive prince of the emirate (Alexander Siddig) and a Pakistani immigrant (Mazhar Munir) who loses his oil-refinery job in the Persian Gulf because of all the boardroom machinations. Despite the sheer complexity of the early going, the story comes together very potently in its second half, with a particularly chilling climax. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Transamerica ★★

It's great to see Felicity Huffman of TV's late, great Sports Night (and now Desperate Housewives) get center stage in a movie, playing the pre-op male transsexual hero(ine) in this road movie. But despite her convincing performance as a high-strung, deeply sad man preparing for an imminent sex change, it's clear early on that first-time writer-director Duncan Tucker is going to keep the tone merely pleasant and surprisingly bland (made blander when weighed against the similarly gender-bending Breakfast on Pluto). Huffman's Stanley "Bree" Osbourne discovers he has a teen son, and his shrink (Elizabeth Pena) requires him to go see this new relative (Kevin Zegers) before she'll sign off on the sex change. But all Tucker can concoct for these two is predictable tension as the strangers road-trip from New York to Los Angeles before their inevitable bonding. (For example, sitcom-style hysterics ensue when, after car trouble, the pair reluctantly stop at Bree's estranged parents' house in Phoenix.) Most of all, Tucker's movie comes across as a pale version of The Station Agent, a more vivid, amusing and heartfelt peek at outsider characters. (At Kendall Square.)

Walk the Line ★★★

Writer-director James Mangold's Johnny Cash biopic isn't Ray Lite, it's Ray White: rural Southern upbringing, childhood tragedy, musical talent, drugs a-plenty, 1960s meltdown, triumphant comeback on the way to icon status. As Jamie Foxx did in Ray, Joaquin Phoenix gives a strong, galvanizing performance as Cash, in a story that takes him from farmland to Folsom Prison concert and marriage to the woman he long pursued, June Carter (Reese Witherspoon). It's that pursuit that drags out the movie, though. Carter initially repels Cash's advances because they're both married when they first meet, then because he becomes a drugged-up wreck from not being with her. In addition to Cash's desire to please his forever-unimpressed dad (Robert Patrick)—who sees Johnny as inferior to his brother, who died as a kid—this thwarted affair is about the only motivation we're given for our hero. Phoenix gives Cash an earthy charm and Witherspoon makes Carter a smart spitfire, and they both gain points for doing their own vocals. But after a while, you want to say, "We get it! He wants to shack up with her." Despite Cash's fiery comeback with the Folsom Prison concert (and its hit live album), the last third drags because of the monotony of the pursuit, taking some pep out of an otherwise evocative tribute to a musical legend. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Raise the Ceiling

From the studio to the slopes, moe. transcends the jam band stigma.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Al Schnier knows a jam band identity can be a turnoff for some people. "At times, you're written off by journalists and other music listeners," says the moe. guitarist. And that's a shame for those who haven't checked out moe. for just that reason.

Sure, moe. spins taut, heady jams with interlocking guitar flights, meaty bass lines and propulsive percussion that can push a song past the 15-minute mark onstage. But as the upstate–New York band enters its 15th year, moe. is building equal respect from fans and critics alike for its distinctive three-way vocals and intricate, engaging songcraft.

"Song structure became important to us years ago," Schnier says. "It's funny, but in the jam band world, that's not really a priority.

"We're big record geeks and studio-recording fans, and we don't want to have to ignore that passion," says Schnier, whose quintet's classic-rock influences include Steely Dan and Frank Zappa as well as the Grateful Dead. "It's a great creative outlet for us to get into a studio mode and tweak songs for all they're worth. But you still want to do what has worked so far for the band, which is performing live."

Past CDs had earned moe. rave reviews from Rolling Stone and Blender. But the group (named after the Louis Jordan song "Five Guys Named Moe") appears to have struck the right balance between studio perfection and live energy on 2003's Wormwood and a new album due this spring on the band's Fatboy label.

For Wormwood, moe. recorded about 30 concerts to mine basic tracks for studio elaboration. On the new disc, the group tries to perfect the process, starting with the consistency of using one space, the State Theatre in Portland, Maine. "We were there 10 days and recorded kinda around the clock, with an audience and without," Schnier says. "Then we used those recordings as a framework.

"Traditionally, rock bands will go into the studio and everyone sets up around the room," he says. "You want to keep as much live material as possible, but invariably you go back and replace things piece by piece until it sounds right. And it's not really any different than our approach at the State Theatre, the only difference being that we were set up onstage like we do every night. We were sort of in our world.

"Some of those old theaters sound amazing, and the acoustics can't be recreated in the studio," adds Schnier, whose band plays the Orpheum Theatre Jan. 19. "One of the cool things is that we got a very expensive surround-sound microphone called the Holophone, which looks like a space-age football with seven high-end condenser mikes built in. And we suspended that from the ceiling about 50 feet away from the stage, and the drum sounds are just incredible."

So fans can look forward to versions of new songs like "Tailspin," "The Pit" and the Rush-esque instrumental "McBain" different from the ones moe. has recorded on its own pricey mike rigs at shows in hopes of catching improvisational bliss to rival any post-Phish jam band.

"Do we ever reach that sort of telepathic quality? I don't know, but it's great when those moments happen, and they happen a lot more now," Schnier says from his home outside Utica. "A lot comes from having that history together.

"We have a really good thing going on here, and that fills a certain creative need," says Schnier, who joined bassist Rob Derhak and guitarist Chuck Garvey to launch the band at the University of Buffalo. They eventually added drummer Vinnie Amico and percussionist Jim Loughlin, who broadens the sound with electronic vibes, piccolo bass and acoustic guitar, while Schnier injects synthesizer textures.

"We each bring our own element to it and create this thing that's uniquely moe." he says. "I've had several people in the last year tell me about hearing random recordings and knowing that it was us just from listening to an instrumental passage, which I thought was really great, that some personality or trademark is recognizable."

Beyond the music, the band's conceptual imagination also surfaces at special events like New Year's Eve, Halloween (when members have performed as Willy Wonka characters and mullet-styled metalheads) and the annual moe.down festival.

"It's really more of it being destination events rather than being conceptual," says Schnier, whose group will head the multi-band Snoe.down at Lake Placid's Olympic Center on March 17-19 as a ski-town flipside to summer's moe.down. "There's no reason it couldn't become an annual winter carnival," he says of that first collaboration with Great Northeast Productions, which organized Phish's festivals. And for next January, moe. has already booked a Caribbean cruise.

"Those are more like the convention gigs," Schnier says. "Everybody converges in one place and you don't have to do any more traveling. You can hang out and enjoy yourselves." iB

WHAT MAKES A GREAT BARTENDER?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartenders issue.

IMPROPER sightings

UNLIKE THE REST OF YOUR FRIENDS, WE WANT TO SEE THE PHOTOS FROM YOUR NEXT TRIP.

Where do you take us? Send us a picture of you or a friend, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed Improper Sightings.

Kerrqoi Perri and Lucifie Pringle snapped this shot at the Magic Kingdom in Orlando, and yes, we're just as confused as you are.

Ani Arakelianson saw the Matenadaran in Yerevan, Armenia, which serves as a repository for ancient Armenian manuscripts. No word yet on whether THE IMPROPER made the cut.

Frank Forray and Lisa Braxton visited Table Mountain in Cape Town, South Africa. Next they checked out Armoire Pond, followed by a trip to Lamp Shade Forest.

Clayton Forsey, a member of the House of Assembly in Canada, couldn't foresee any problems with our Music Issue. (Ouch...)

As is the Festivus tradition, Dan Robertson performed his Feat of Strength by holding up the Leaning Tower of Pisa, all the while looking just like Terry Francona.

Hotel Commonwealth's Tim Kirwan (back right), City Councilor John Tobin (Sox hat) and friends enjoyed the Blue Lagoon, a hot spring in Reykjavik, Iceland. Afterward, they enjoyed The Blue Lagoon, starring Brooke Shields.

IMPROPER BOUNTY

BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER:
Acting as a judge for the Camel Beauty Pageant during the annual Bikaner Camel Festival, held Jan. 13-14 in Bikaner, India.

Roxana von Kraus

Dear Friends,

In the spirit of the New Year and the new beginnings, I would like to introduce you to my company and its Journeys of Imagination.

For 10 years, Quo Vadis has been the exclusive organizer of the WBUR Citizens of the World Tours. Superbly researched and organized, these tours were meant to educate and inform. The tours presented the world of news to our travelers and showed the world some well-informed, open and inquisitive American minds -- not a small deed in today's state of affairs!

The tradition of excellence continues with Quo Vadis. Our destinations are exotic and daring – from Transylvania and Crete to Libya and Bhutan. The groups are small, allowing for flexibility and creativity in the itinerary. We always travel as "friends sharing a good time", never as "bus tourists following an umbrella."

Please join us,

Una Bella Serata

rockie horoscope

JANUARY 11 – 24, 2006 BY ROCKIE GARDINER

CAPRICORN DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

The year starts off very well because fortunate Venus is in Capricorn until March; the next month in your Aquarius house of assets is also good, although you may wind up with more stuff than you bargained for. The goddess adds luster to romance while she transits sensuous Taurus in June. A partnership mindset may intensify in mid-summer, but because your Saturn ruler is stressed out then, keep a watchful eye on joint investments. Curry favor with receptive clients in October; reward yourself in December when Venus is back in your sign.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

It might not seem like a big deal, but having access to Chiron's healing powers gives Aquarians born in January a gift from the gods. Heavenly blessings are available to all while affable Venus visits your sign in March. June and July may be difficult because idealistic Neptune is threatened by a double dose of problems, i.e., Mars and Saturn in your Leo partnership house, and a turn of current events may exacerbate your dilemma. Finances continue to be governed by your Uranus ruler weathering Pisces' fluctuations.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

One way to deal with Mercury retrograde during March is to celebrate your birthday someplace where time stands still. Since precious little progress will be made during the retrogression, feel free to escape. If you want progress, wait until energetic Mars transits your Cancer house of creativity and romance in May. In July, Mercury's retrograde period could coincide with a visit from a former lover because Venus is also in Cancer. Mercury's third reversal occurs while transiting your Scorpio house of foreign travel in November.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

If 2005 felt like a slowpoke of a year, with not enough happening to suit an adventurous, impatient Aries, you'll be pleased to learn that in 2006 your Mars ruler does NOT go retrograde, nor does it remain in one fixed sign (value-conscious Taurus) for six long months. Come mid-February when Mars enters mutable, movable Gemini, this cooling-your-heels period is fini. During the rest of the year, Mars races through the next six signs, winding up in foot-loose Sagittarius, a hot-to-trot fire sign like your own. Best time for romance: May through August.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

The fire down below that has provided motivation, physical energy and temper tantrums for the last six months goes out when aggressive Mars exits Taurus just after Valentine's Day. Since you'll remain protected by generous Jupiter in your partnership house, you needn't worry that you'll be left on your own—certainly not while your attractive Venus ruler visits Taurus in June or your Virgo house of romance and recreation in September. Schedule vacations accordingly. Best time for financial finagling: May and June.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

There may be more to the rhythm of the Twins' life than your Mercury ruler's retrograde schedule; nonetheless here it is: From March 2 to 25 an issue concerning your career and/or family situation could be stuck in limbo. A financial matter may be delayed while the Messenger backtracks through your money house from July 4-28. During the Halloween weekend, in the midst of major astrological events, Mercury turns retrograde in Scorpio until Nov. 17. Where's the love? Starting at the summer solstice, peaking in October.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

The eclipses of 2006 can significantly impact the Moon Child, so make a note: A lunar eclipse on the Ides of March, a total solar eclipse on the 29th, a partial lunar eclipse on Sep. 7 and another solar event just hours before the autumnal equinox. Restrictive Saturn in your Leo money house continues to teach the value of a dollar while lucky Jupiter in your Scorpio house of romance risk says, "Take a chance." Spruce up and lay back in mid-July when both sociable Venus and Mercury retrograde are in your sign.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Check the Cancer forecast for eclipses, reminding yourself that the lunar ones increase your power while the solar ones diminish it. Saturn in your sign can be a bummer, but it could also strengthen your backbone (the Leo sore spot). Expansive Jupiter in your Scorpio home base preaches "spend, spend," but be aware that the jolly giant tends to exaggerate. Neptune in your Aquarius marriage house continues to weave a magic spell, more so while artistic, affectionate Venus joins him during March. Money comes in fits and starts.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

Read Gemini for your Mercury ruler's retrograde timetable, adding a couple of weeks before and after for dotting i's and making repairs. Activity in your career zone (for the first time in two years) occurs while assertive Mars transits your Gemini midheaven from mid-February thru mid-April. However, Pluto opposing from home can put you in a tricky position, playing one determined force against another. Relationships continue to be erratic (except during April, when loving Venus visits your Pisces house of partners). As for money, there's another balancing act.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Since your amenable Venus ruler visits every sign in 2006, you'll have a shot at everyone—primarily, for the first two months, a respectable Capricorn. Look for romance and/or recreation with an Aquarius in March, partnering with an Aries in May, traveling with a congenial companion in June and bonding with your boss in the summer. Save October for yourself; that's when Venus, passionate Mars and the creative sun get together in your sign. As for finances, not to worry; protective Jupiter has your money house covered.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

The best news is that prosperous Jupiter remains in Scorpio until Thanksgiving, although while it is retrograde from March through June you might not be quite as fortunate as you've been. However, Jupiter transiting your Sagittarius money house through 2007 will extend your run of good luck for another year. As long as unpredictable Uranus inhabits your Pisces house of risky ventures, nothing is a sure bet, but the odds improve while romantic Venus passes through in April. Opportunity knocks around your birthday; let it in.

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

The new year begins and ends with magnetic Venus in your house of income and assets. However, her charms might not attract a hot-blooded romantic interest until May, nor an agreeable partnership arrangement until she transits Gemini in late June and early July. Meanwhile, Mars passing through your marriage house in March could cause discomfort and unrest. If you intend to travel in early summer when your Jupiter ruler is tested by Martian militancy and Saturn's regulations, be extra cautious. You don't need problems with the authorities.

K, My Great Love

It happened so fast
Really came out of nowhere
But how could it happen?
There was always someone else there.

We weren't supposed to do this.
But who are we Should we get in the way of Fate
Or are we supposed to let it be?

When I look into your eyes
The entire world goes away
I just want to make you happy
Every minute of every day.

I really didn't want this to happen
I was running away from love
It was easier not to have it
No broken heart, nobody to think of.

We tried to stay away
We knew that we should
But even though we knew
There was no way we could.

You need some space right now
So we'll spend some time apart
You'll figure out who you are
And where I fit in your heart.

Irish Beauty

You: a true Irish beauty, from Limerick, Ireland, working in an Irish pub near North Station. Your name is Barbara K.

Me: an Irish-American bad boy who happened to wander into the pub you worked at a few years ago. We went out that night, and a few others, including one great one that started with us at a Robbie William concert at the Paradise and ended the next morning with me going grocery shopping and cooking you breakfast. I haven't been the same since. Since we lost touch, my Irish eyes haven't been smiling.

I'm incarcerated because of my old bad boy ways. If you read this, or anyone who knows you does, please write. I want to show you I'm no longer a bad boy; I'd like to think now that I'm a good man.
—Michael O'Brien

Hi Gym Buddy

Worked out together at the YMCA Gym on Huntington Ave. We checked each other out—you, great body, great looks! Let's get together. I saw you later in the locker room. I was too shy to say anything. I'm in the second row of lockers. You are in the third row. My heart still can't stay still.

Gas Station Love

I saw the most amazing woman on the day after Christmas and I didn't even really meet her. ...After spending another Christmas Day with family on White Horse Beach in Plymouth (once again single for the holiday), I departed sometime between 8 and 9 am to head back to Boston. Since I didn't shave, shower or even clean up prior to my departure, I was clearly not looking my best.

On the way, I stopped off at exit 6 on Route 3 North and pulled into the Hess Station on Samoset Street to fill up my 4Runner. After filling up, I proceeded to the HessMart to pay for my gas when I looked up and saw you, this gorgeous brunette with an amazing smile and bright white eyes. First thought in my head: "God damn, she is absolutely beautiful!"

After paying for my gas, I left the HessMart and, while walking back to my truck, looked up and saw you in your car getting ready to leave. As you looked up, I couldn't hold it back and mouthed, "You are beautiful." You smiled and mouthed back to me, "Thank you."

As my heart was pounding, I stepped back into my truck to decide what to do next, either give you my card or drive away. Since I figured that there's no way you were available, I regrettably did the latter. I've not been able to get you out of my mind since then and need to find you!

You drive something similar to a white Chrysler Sebring.The only other detail I know...

Where's the Beav?

This is for my co-worker "June Cleaver," who every Monday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday morning says "So, I met this kid last night..." but won't Impersonal him/them.

Do ya' thang girl...do ya' thang.
—Your cool-ass co-worker-Sugga

It Takes One to Know One

I read Cinderella's letter, entitled "A Royal Pain." She sounds witty and fun. I can relate to her difficulty in meeting people as well as her loneliness. Do you think she meant to leave an e-mail address, or was she just venting? Is there some way to get in touch with her?
—Like Cinderella

Scone Lady

You work at the Oxford Spa (coffee place/deli) on Oxford Street in Cambridge, and I've been coming to your store for about a year and a half now. The first time was the day after I moved back here, and it was my first day at my new job. Your beauty and your smile as you served me two delicious scones gave me the needed boost to take on the challenge...

You are drop-dead gorgeous, and I'm only one of your numerous admirers. You consistently look amazing.

You must have bad days like everyone, but that doesn't show at all. You're always nice, and your smile is so welcoming. I know it's lame to focus on beauty, but it's your inner beauty that makes your physical beauty so shining. I wish I could come more often. Sadly, I live quite a distance from the store, which makes every one of my trips there all the nicer.

Please continue to be striking.
—An Admirer

You Drive My Train

To the woman driving the Red Line train to Alewife, I couldn't help but notice the sassy look you gave me when I took a picture of your train as it sped past me on the Park Street platform. My notions were validated when I took my seat and you spoke to me over the intercom system. You told me that it's illegal to take pictures of MBTA property. What's really against the law is for someone so beautiful to be cooped up in that conductor's booth all day long! You also reminded me that you were driving a train, and could've been "blinded" by my flash. All I can say is that I will continue to blind you with my dazzling display of chivalrous courtship if you'll only drive your love train straight into my heart.
Yours,
—The Man with the Digi Cam

Beer Babe

You're the gorgeous man with the shaved head who sat next to me at the Charlotte Airport bar on May 14. You said you work for the government. I was flying back to Richmond from the Bahamas.

We discussed the poor selection of beer and our preferences. You live in Boston and have a sister who was about to be married in Loudoun County, Va. I wish we had exchanged numbers. I can't stop thinking about you!

THOSE PAGANS KNOW HOW TO PARTY...

The shortest day of the year is as good a reason as any to celebrate, which is why the Christmas Revels marked its 35th anniversary with a Medieval Winter Solstice Celebration at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Before the performance of traditional music and dance, attendees gathered in Loker Commons for a bit of wassailing and merriment. Present and accounted for: musical director George Emlen and his enchanting wife, Jan, Bruce Springsteen's right hand man George Travis and the lovely Lenore of Lincoln, physician/fashion plate Anne St. Goar and her husband, Revels board president Shippen Page, bright young things Christine Cronin and Bruce Walker (whose Dad was a Morris dancer in the Revels for 30 years), the delightful Prudence Humphreys, the surpassingly chic Carol Lasky (mother of a string trio in training) with investment adviser Bob Hurley, self-described "Revels brat" Angus Beasley with his father, Chris (aka "the nicest man in the world"), and his Anglo-Saxon sugar-baby Kirsty Allore, Sherborn party pair Kay Dunlap and Steve Solomon (a major muckety muck at the Peabody Essex Museum), Cambridge novelist Al Gown, educational philanthropists Peter and Rebecca Clapp of Maine, former Millipore CEO John Gilmartin and the scintillating Mary Ann, architect Jay Heespelink and his other half, Ruth, and Cambridge legal eagle Donald Ware.

After some mulled cider, singing and delicious nibblies, everyone headed upstairs for the performance, but not before the following exchange took place between one guest and a Revels board member:

"My five-year-old grandaughter loved the show."

"Great! Maybe she'll be in it one year."

"When you do a tae-kwon-do–themed Revels, she'll be the first to audition."

I'LL HAVE A BLUE (BLOODED) CHRISTMAS...

One of the city's great holiday traditions to endures, as the patrician, prep school, Ivy League, old money crowd gathered in the ballroom of the Park Plaza for the Winter Ball, an intergenerational white-tie affair where Brahmins dust off their diamonds and put those childhood dancing lessons to use by waltzing into the wee hours.

Guests were greeted at the door by a receiving line of this year's crop of debutantes: Caroline Hollingsworth Baker, Siena Antonia von Tscharner Fleming, Julianna Clarke Howland, Devlin Amanda Hughes, Amory Cummings Minot, Katherine Elizabeth Minton, Chynna Baury Pope and Avery Wilson Winn.

Shaking their hands were such hale and hearty, well-met types as Gale Minot, daughter Hilary and Michael Halperson, grand old man Michael Robbins with statuesque professor Dagmar Ringe, Sherborn socialites Mary Kay and Nicholas Holder, mustachioed muchacho Wesley Tyrrel, financial guru Swing Robertson, the stunning Desrine Reid and Robyn Aldo, real estate mag-daddy Todd Friedman (sporting red and green Converse high-tops with his tuxedo), ebony goddess Chantelle Carpenter and her fiancé Darryl Sterling, international jet-setters Krystian von Speidel and Nathan Frank, the soignée Rhys Gardiner and her beau, Sean McInerney, the relentlessly social Alec Stern, upper-crust Brit Andrew McIlwraith and his blushing bride, Tish Robbins, well-bred playboy Peter Creighton, real estate investor Luke Peterson with the staggeringly beautiful Wendy Savage, and brunette bombshell Julie-Hume Sprague, who just moved back to Boston after a sojourn in the Midwest and said, "Chicago is great, but the problem with it is that you can be anywhere in the country within four hours with the exception of Maine and Palm Beach."

Speaking of which, one guest asked another, "Where'd you get that tan, Palm Beach?" to which she replied, "No. Estée Lauder."

By midnight, the body count was three (people passed out cold), while couples continued to flock to the dance floor. Meanwhile, among the witty exchanges overheard:

"I believe what my grandmother used to say about nothing good happening after 2 a.m., but the 12 to 2 a.m. stretch is always exciting."

"Do you waltz?" one woman asked, to which the man responded, "Only after I've had too much to drink," while, regarding the difficulty of doing the tango, one accomplished ballroom dancer said, "It's no big deal. A lady always knows where to put her leg."

And finally, one guest said, "I was in West Africa while you were in India," to which his friend replied, "Then I'm sure we have a lot of stories to exchange about inadequate sewage." iB

Perfection has its price.

Thought Stella Artois took a while to brew? You should see the time it takes to pour. When you brew a beer as perfect as Stella Artois, you're going to be just a bit picky about how it is served. Which is why we like bartenders to follow a carefully organized ritual when they pour it. This includes everything from rinsing the glass, to cutting the excess foam from the head. And even making sure the logo on the coaster and chalice are turned to face the customer. Which might sound fussy to you. But then we're fussy about everything when it comes to our beer.

The beautiful blue agave grows naturally in the Jalisco region of Mexico around the town of Tequila.

That's the way we like it. So that's the way we leave it. Natural. Because that way, our tequila tastes of... well... agave. Pure and simple.

It doesn't taste of pesticides. It doesn't taste of herbicides. And it doesn't have the bitterness that comes from some cheaper production processes, either.

What all this means is that, like all our tequila, Sauza® Tres Generaciones® doesn't require the flavour enhancers that others have to add to mask less pleasant tastes.

Sauza® Tres Generaciones® tastes like tequila should taste. We know you'll enjoy it. That's why you won't find a trace of bitterness.

GOOD GUYS

What does it mean to be a man in today's society? For better or worse, we chose to ignore meaningful topics like that in our third annual Man Issue, instead veering wholly into masculine frivolity.

So instead of thoughtful stories about courageous men, or being a caring husband or dad, we offer the results of a contest where four local guys competed in furniture assembly, spicy food–eating, football-tossing and sports knowledge. Throw in a lingerie shoot at a casino, an analysis of which unhealthful foods are least bad for you and advice for guys on handling the sticky situations they seem to stumble into, and you've got our lineup of heavy reading material for Boston guys. Maybe next year we'll take the high road.

CAPE CORRECTION

Thanks for the article by Tracy Mayor about my hometown of Gloucester (Dec. 21). Our cape does have a lot to offer, with grit. However, the caption under the lead picture said "The Old Man of the Sea keeps watch over Gloucester harbor." Everyone here on Cape Ann knows that it's "The Man at Wheel."

KUDOS TO THE NUDE-O

I was in Boston and picked up a copy of the IMPROPER. On thumbing through I came upon the article on naked yoga (Jan. 11). I carefully studied the lines of the human form on the page—great photo. And then I came upon the face of the work of art before me. I nearly sprang out of my chair when I realized it was Jonathan Soroff. The article was a riot and highly informative, too. I always wondered which part of a man's body sweated first.

—ROSEMARY SPEARIN
Wells, Maine

KRAZY FOR KRASINSKI

Thanks for running the smirk-inducing interview with actor John Krasinski (Dec. 21). His character on The Office has won my heart. I can easily relate to his wise-cracks and the sarcastic, under-the-breath comments he shares with the camera. I'm looking forward to seeing more outstanding work from this near-Boston native.

—NICOLE COOK
St. Louis, Mo.

JUST A MINUTE, MEN

In your article on the suburbs (Dec. 21) you left out the most important food place to visit in Lexington: Wilson Farm. I'm a realtor, and when showing new clients the town's attractions, Wilson Farm is at the top of the list. Come back—you missed something!

THE WORD

EDITED BY ERIN GRAHAM

A New Life for Limbo

The three levels that used to be the nightclub Limbo have been reincarnated as a loungearaunt —that new hybrid of restaurant and lounge that's springing up all over town. Just off the main streets of Downtown Crossing, Ivy Restaurant's mood-lit main floor is a welcoming collection of banquettes, tables and a giant marble bar, with a loft-like open space above. Trippy touches abound, with gently glowing marble set off by soft red lighting and red leather chairs, stretches of an old black Victorian fence and some subtle touches of its namesake plant. Below is the cave-like lounge called Cava, with birch bark décor, small cocktail tables and ultralow plush seats.

The menu offers signature drinks, like the Tiramisu and the Ivy Nectar (all are less than a Hamilton), and all of the bottles on Ivy's wine list (more than 50 of them, mostly Italian and American) cost a flat $24. If you'd rather pair courses with wines, you can quaff a quartina (8 or 16 oz.), in Riedel stemware no less.

Ivy's Italian comfort food, created by chef Josh Breen (Bricco and News), comes in the form of small plates that are meant to be shared: think tapas but bigger, and somehow with a smaller price. Ivy's house salad ($5) comes in a big wooden bowl and is plenty for two; and the Italian butcher block (also $5) is an array of sliced cured meats, cheeses, marinated olives and a sumptuous fig-garlic purée to spread over grilled bread. The rest of the menu is divided into Primi Piatti ($6-$12), for shared sampling, and Piatti, entrée-sized plates like Livornese cacciuo: shrimp, scallops, calamari and mussels in a saffron-tomato broth. Skimming the menu, our eyes (and appetites) were depressingly much bigger than our stomachs, but we managed to try the tasty roast beet salad with grilled goat cheese, wrapped in a grape leaf ($7); creamy black-truffle-and-gorgonzola mac & cheese ($11); and airy butternut squash ravioli with brown butter and sage ($9). The hours are tailored to the carousing crowd; late-night diners can order until the kitchen closes at midnight. For those who choose not to rock & roll all night, on Sundays, Ivy offers an all-you-can-eat spaghetti and meatball buffet.

In a welcome departure from convention, diners can ask for anything cooked to order, and substitutions are just fine with the kitchen. What you can't do is order dessert: Along with your check comes a plate of gelato, served in teensy cones. At the downstairs lounge, Cava, however, you can order a dessert: a chocolate hazelnut fondue with fresh fruit and pound cake. Here, you can linger over morsels like mozzarella fonduta with grilled Tuscan bread; or tomato and homemade mozzarella pizza. Open for lunch Mon.-Fri., 11:30 am-3:30 pm; dinner daily, 5 pm-12 am; cocktails daily until 2 am. 49 Temple Place, Boston (617-451-1416). —E.G.

Amy Acuff is a three-time Olympic high jumper, mod and licensed acupuncturist who's graced the covers Esquire, Vogue and Playboy. She's been ranked first in t United States three times, and no lower than third in t nation for each of the last 10 years. On Jan. 28, s comes to Boston to compete in the 11th annual Reeb Boston Indoor Games at the Reggie Lewis Track a Athletic Center.

Improper Bostonian: So the Beijing Olympics aren't until 2008, but it's never too early to start getting excite right?

Amy Acuff: It's never too early. I'm training for Beiji now, and it'll be my last go at it, so I'm very focused making this trip the best. It's a process, but I still get e cited about it every day.

IB: I've read that you started competing at five years old. What kind of jumps were you putting up back then?

AA: Nothing too great. I was just tagging along at r brother's track competition and they had races for t younger siblings. I think I won a pink ribbon. I'm not su what that meant, but I've always had a competiti streak in me.

IB: Do you get out much while competing in Boston or is usually all business?

AA: Well, I'm kind of a wimp about the cold, so I nev stay out for too long. I went out to a restaurant Boston during the 2003 Nationals and had my pur stolen off the back of my chair! That could have ha pened anywhere though. No hard feelings.

IB: What's more nerve-racking: jumping in the Olympics or posing for Playboy*?*

AA: Definitely the Playboy thing. There's no question.

Now Celebrating Our 200th Year of Worldwide Scarcity.

In an era obsessed with production both mass and fast, our snail-pace distilling and blending methods are woefully archaic. For seven admittedly stubborn generations we've placed a much higher value on final quality than final quantity.

This is precisely why our rums have earned a rather cult-like following, not to mention numerous awards. It's also why we refuse to shortcut our methods in order to hasten the output. If this means you won't find a bottle of Gosling's on every shelf and bar, so it must be. Anything exceptional is worth a little extra effort. On both of our parts.

No Break from Steak... The steak houses, they just keep on comin'. On Jan. 11, Jeff Karll (of G'vanni's Ristorante in the North End) and Ed Barsamian (formerly of Barsamian's in Cambridge) opened Boston's latest meat market, G'vanni's Steakhouse Italiano on North Washington Street. The space boasts two dining rooms and displays a collection of authentic Tuscan artwork, including an official Vatican Royal Coat of Arms. The kitchen's headed up by master chef John DeCristofaro, and chef d'cuisine Romeo Almeida has stocked the menu with real Tuscan fare like steak pizziaiola, peasant steak braciola and steak della funghi. A New Load of Legals... Legal Sea Foods president Roger Berkowitz isn't content with simply being the Hub's seafood king. Last March he opened Legal's Test Kitchen in Logan Airport, where the menu features only 35 percent seafood, instead focusing on a wider array of dishes from braised duck to mushroom ravioli. And the future will see more of the same kinds of less-than-fishy-ventures: Berkowitz plans to open five more test kitchens over the next 2-3 years. Also keep an eye out for Legal C-Bar and Grill, a group of seafood bars tailored for a younger crowd.

Tour of the Tipsy... Ever sat, beer in hand, at one of Boston's older bars and thought, "Hmm, I wonder if any of our forefathers ever got drunk on this bar stool?" Well, they did, and now you can find out what they were drinking and the things they talked about thanks to the Boston Freedom Trail Foundation's newest tour, the Historic Boston Pub Crawl. The walking tour, led by an 18th century–costumed guide, takes you to the Union Oyster House, the Point, the Green Dragon and the Bell in Hand, where you'll sample beers and food while hearing historical tales of good old-fashioned debauchery. The tour begins at 5:30 pm from the BosTix Booth in Faneuil Hall and runs on Jan. 26, Feb. 9 and 23, and March 9 and 23, all Thursdays. (617-357-8300). www.freedomtrail.org. $39.

Fish Frenzy... Out of the Blue, a seafood favorite on Somerville's Highland Avenue fo the past five years, is on the move, but it's not going very far. On Jan. 26, the eatery re opens its doors in Davis Square at the former home of Pluto Boutique (in betwee longtime local faves the Rosebud Diner and Gargoyles). The new location offers th same décor (underwater/ocean-themed mural motif) and menu (selections include lob ster fra diablo, baked haddock and Mediterranean crab cakes) as the old spot, but fea tures a much larger kitchen and has double the seating capacity. Out of the Blue serve dinner daily and lunch Wed.-Fri. 215 Elm St., Somerville (617-776-5020). www.outofth bluerestaurant.com.

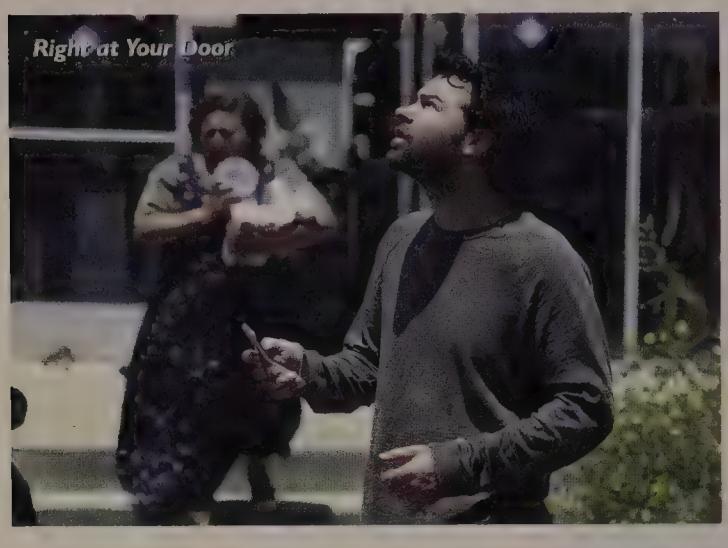
IMPROPER REPORTS

Boston At Sundance

Boston has a share of the spotlight during the Sundance Film Festival, which takes place in Utah, Jan. 19-29. Here are some films with local ties that have made it into the Sundance line-up.



American Hardcore

Director Paul Rachman captures the hardcore punk rock scene across the country in the early '80s. Local bands SS Decontrol, Gang Green and DYS make appearances, and lots of the footage comes from the infamous, now defunct Kenmore Square club the Rat Cellar.

Beyond Beats and Rhymes: A Hip-Hop Head Weighs in on Manhood in Rap Music

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTIO

Hardly Fit to a T... So let's get this straight: The MBTA devises a new system that's supposed to make riding the T easier, and then names it after a song written in protest of a contentious rate hike? Yes, you read that correctly, and no, don't ask us to explain the logic. All we know is this: The new CharlieTickets (basically T passes with a picture)—whose name derives from the 1948 jingle "Charlie on the MTA," about a Bostonian trapped on the T because he couldn't afford the 5-cent exit fee—have already replaced the old monthly passes. But that change is merely cosmetic; once CharlieCards are introduced next summer, users will be able to add money to their passes online or at machines inside T stations, and all riders—not just monthly pass-holders—will be able to swipe their way through electronic gates. (Goodbye, tokens and turnstiles.) While the plan's efficiency is still to be seen, the irony is not.

Ah...Choo... The upscale shoe biz in Boston gets a boost when Jimmy Choo lands at Copley Place in April. Opening in the 1,500-square-foot space now occupied by Gretta Luxe (which will jump over to the Westin Hotel, next to Grettacole Spa), the store will be decorated to feel like a bedroom closet. And like many of the company's other boutiques in New York, London, Beverly Hills, Miami and Dallas, the Boston store will be home to Jimmy Choo's full collection—revamped three times a year, with the spring and summer line, the fall and winter line and the cruise line. Ahh, a closet filled with Jimmy Choos. Keep saving, gals, it won't be long now. www.jimmychoo.com.

Middleman America... These days people are selling anything and everything online, but the process can be tedious. That's where the new Needham-based company NextWorth comes in. Here's how it works: NextWorth finds online sites that sell your specific kind of loot—everything from cameras to cars—then takes care of the posting and selling. In exchange, they get $20, plus 33 percent of the first $1,000 of a sale, plus 20 percent on each additional dollar if your item sells for more than $1,000. Finally, we have someone to help us find a buyer for all those Patriots three-peat t-shirts we had printed up. www.nextworth.com.

Mass. Monkey... The animated Curious George (Drew Barrymore and Will Ferrell are among the stars providing voices) hits the big screen mid-February, and it may come as a surprise to most Bostonians that our favorite childhood primate has a local tie. His creators, Hans and Margret Rey, fled Germany for Paris on homemade bicycles in 1940 with little more than a bundle of manuscripts, including one about an inquisitive little monkey. The couple lived in Rio de Janeiro for a bit and had a brief stay in New York, but they eventually settled in Cambridge, beginning a life as two of the best-loved children's book authors in the world. Though the Reys have passed away, their stories—published by Boston-based Hougton Mifflin—live on, with more than 25 million copies of their books sold. Now that's local celebrity status we can be proud of. www.curiousgeorgemovie.com.

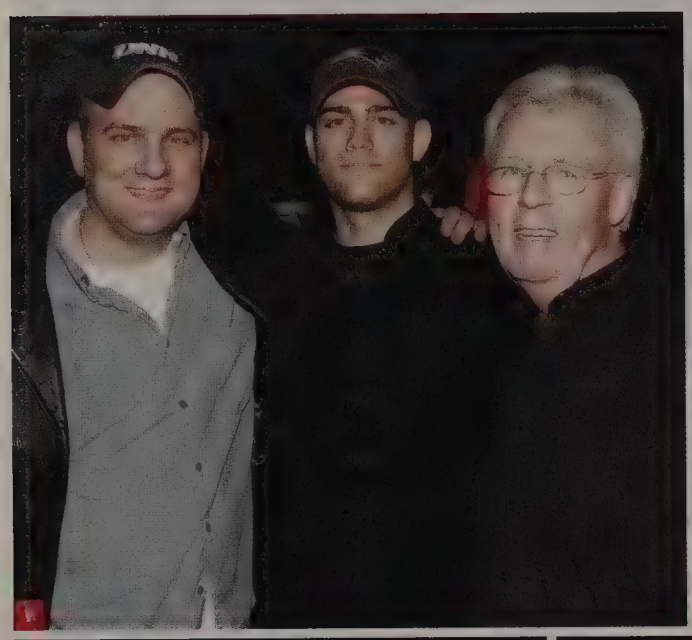
PROPER BOSTONIANS

BY KERRY BRETT HURLEY



Some 300 people attended the pre-party for The Sixth Annual Hot Stove, Cool Music event, held at the Paradise Rock Club on Jan. 8. The concert included performances by a host of Boston sports and entertainment stars, including Kay Hanley; Buffalo Tom, featuring former Red Sox General Manager Theo Epstein; and Peter Gammons and the Hot Stove All-Stars. The event was hosted by Mike O'Malley, star of the CBS sitcom Yes Dear, and was expected to raise more than $125,000 for the Red Sox Foundation and the Jimmy Fund. The Improper Bostonian was the print sponsor for the event.

1. Mike O'Malley, star of CBS's Yes Dear, Theo Epstein, former Red Sox general manager, and Peter Gammons, ESPN baseball analyst.
2. Jon Leahy, Mike O'Malley's assistant, and Yvonne Ortiz, commercial producer for Room 206 in L.A.
3. Jill Smagula, bartender at Noir, and Dani Files, bartender at People's Republic.
4. Bill Janovitz, vocalist/guitarist for Buffalo Tom, and Kay Hanley, singer/songwriter.
5. Clint Walsh, member of the Bronson Arroyo Band, Billy Bud, production manager for the Paradise, and Pete Stone bartender at the Middle East.
6. Casey Riddles, bartender at Lucca in the North End, and Stacy Lynes, photographer for the Hot Stove Web site.
7. Keith Gainsboro, principal for Elevate Communications, and Meghan Campbell, account manager for Elevate Communications.
8. Melinda Stolp and Danny Jamison, cast members of MTV's Real World Austin.

Raising the Roof: Celebrating Martin Luther King, Jr. in Song was held Monday, Jan. 16, at NEC's Jordan Hall and featured a performance by the Boston Children's Chorus. Two-hundred supporters, board members and friends of the choir gathered at the pre-concert reception.

9. Winnie Hagan, executive director for the Roxbury Weston Programs, and David Howse, director of programs & community impact for the Boston Children's Chorus.
10. Muriene Allen, assistant vice president, and Sonia Alleyne Matthews, community relations manager, both of Sovereign Bank; and Charlayne Murrell-Smith, vice president of external relations for the Boston Children's Museum.
11. Vivien Li, executive director of the Boston Harbor Association, Trip Jones, senior vice president of the Mentor Network, and his wife, Robin.
12. Clayton Turnbull, CEO of the Waldwin Group, and his wife, Linda.

THAT'S RICH

BY RICH LEVY

The Great Ones

What are the most important sports stories of the last 50 years?

The other Sunday, in between rounds of R.C. Pro-Am and a full slate of NFL football, I came across a rerun of Stump the Schwab, an ESPN game show where guys take turns trying to outsmart the Schwab, a slovenly coordinating producer at ESPN who looks like a combination of Captain Lou Albano and Roger Ebert. The Schwab never loses. He's like Dustin Hoffman in Rain Man, except he doesn't have a psychopathic actor portraying his brother.

Naturally, I thought I could beat him, and went online to download an application. Some of the questions were no-brainers:

Favorite athlete of all-time? Bo Jackson (Mark Blount and Reggie Jefferson are last).

Best game you've seen in person? Super Bowl XXXVI: Pats 20, Rams 17.

Has a sports book or movie ever inspired you? Wilt's View From Above motivated me to be more promiscuous, Cool Runnings inspired me to put together an all-Jewish bobsled team and White Men Can't Jump convinced me to back out of that deal to purchase a used car from the Stucci brothers.

But then they hit me with a whopper: What have been the top five sports stories of the past 50 years? Here's what I came up with (in no particular order).

1966 NCAA basketball championship
When Texas Western's all-black starting five upset Kentucky and its all-white starting five to take the title, it was more than just a game. At a time when segregation was still embarrassingly commonplace and the civil-rights movement was peaking, this game broke down more racial barriers than any before or after, and changed basketball forever. I've always felt that any Hall of Famer who played before black athletes could participate at an equal level should have an asterisk next to his name. I've seen the highlights of Dolph Shayes and Bob Cousy. I know they could ball, but how can they be all-time greats when a majority of their generation's talent pool wasn't allowed to compete?

2004 World Series
It's all been done to death, but the significance of the BoSox victory isn't debatable. It increased the lifespan of Sox fans by an average of five years. Yeah, there are still people out there who spend their weekends obsessing over No. 5 starters and middle relievers, but for most of us, 2004 made rooting for the Sox fun again; the 86-year-old monkey was off our back. And tortured sports fans everywhere were given a reason to keep believing.

Steroids in baseball
How would you feel if you found ou Michael Jordan wore Flubber in his sneaker from 1991-1998, or that Jerry Rice lathered rubber cement all over himself from 1989 1995? You'd be pissed. I skipped many a clas during the fall of 1998 to watch every Mar McGwire and Sammy Sosa at-bat I could; was obsessed. But in the end, 2.54 represent not only my GPA from that forgettable se mester, but also the percentage of respect have left for Mac, Sammy and their big headed, tiny-testicled friends.

MJ's first retirement
When people talk about NBA dynasties there's the Lakers and Celtics of the '80s, th Bulls of the '90s and, alone at the top, th Celtics of the '50s and '60s. But it didn have to be that way. The Bulls could an should have won eight in a row and bee right up there with the old-school C's.

> "THE FIRST DREAM TEAM WAS HISTORIC, BUT EVERYTHING SINCE HAS BEEN PATHETIC."

know Michael had his reasons for leavin but getting robbed of two years of his prim still hurts.

Feb. 22, 1980: The Miracle on Ice
I was only 19 days old when Eruzione and c took down the Soviets, but from all I' read, watched and heard, there's no way th game can be left out. It was the height of an ateur athletics—maybe athletics in ge eral—in our country. It's really a shame wh a joke the Olympics have become. The no elty of pros playing wore off long ago; th original Dream Team was historic (I have Team USA Laettner jersey to prove it), b everything since, in both hockey and hoop has been pathetic. Why not bring the am teurs back to the Olympics? We'll have best another great story, and at the very le a legitimate excuse the next time Tea USA drops one to Angola. IB

Soroff ON

AL FRANKEN

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Comedian, best-selling author and liberal talk-radio host Al Franken was born in New York in 1951 and lived in New Jersey before moving to Minnesota, where he spent most of his childhood. After graduating from Harvard, he went to L.A. and did stand-up comedy, but he returned to New York in 1975 when Lorne Michaels hired him as a writer and sometime performer for the nascent Saturday Night Live. During his tenure at SNL, he received four Emmys for writing and one for producing. As half of the Franken and Davis comedy team, and with characters such as the New Age self-help cable TV host Stuart Smalley, he was responsible for seminal moments in the show's history, and Smalley inspired his first book, I'm Good Enough, I'm Smart Enough and Doggone It, People Like Me. Franken's second book, Rush Limbaugh is a Big Fat Idiot and Other Observations, spent over eight months on the New York Times bestseller list, and his recording of it won the 1997 Grammy for Best Comedy Album. His next two books, Why Not Me? The Making and Unmaking of the Franken Presidency and Oh, the Things I Know! A Guide to Success, or Failing That, Happiness, also made the New York Times bestseller list. Lies and the Lying Liars Who Tell Them: A Fair and Balanced Look at the Right was number one for seven weeks, and his recording of it won him another Grammy in 2003. His latest book, The Truth (With Jokes), is currently available in hard cover, and he hosts the Al Franken Show, Air America Radio's flagship program that also airs on the Sundance Channel. He lives in New York.

Jonathan Soroff: Why haven't you ever been in People magazine's "50 Sexiest People" issue?

Al Franken: I have. [Laughs.] Well, here's the thing. They called when Lies and the Lying Liars... was out, and I jokingly said, "This is for your 'Sexiest People' issue, right?" They said, "Right." I thought it was a joke. And this is how good the journalism is at People magazine: I wasn't among the 50 Sexiest People. I was in one of the additional categories as a metrosexual. Anyone who knows me would say I might be the least metrosexual person alive. I think it was based on one thing: I said that I like to get massages, and that was enough.

JS: Funniest member of the original SNL cast?

AF: Well, everyone was funny in different ways. I worked a lot with Danny [Aykroyd]. He was sort of the consummate live performer, who could do a whole incredible range of stuff and also wrote a lot. That said, [John] Belushi was hilarious. He could elevate a piece of writing so that you were absolutely delighted he was performing it for you. Chevy [Chase] was very funny. Gilda [Radner] was hilarious and an incredibly intelligent performer. They were all great.

"[AT SNL] I'D SNORT A LITTLE BIT OF COKE TO STAY AWAKE AND MAKE SURE OTHER PEOPLE DIDN'T DO TOO MUCH. IT WAS A SAFETY THING."

JS: How much coke did you snort back in those days?

AF: Not nearly as much as a lot of other people. I like to joke that basically on Tuesday nights, I'd snort a little bit of coke to stay awake and make sure other people didn't do too much. It was more of a safety thing. No one died on a Tuesday.

JS: Wildest memory from those days?

AF: Well, there'd be an after-party and then an after-after-party, and those were at the Blues Bar [the private bar/clubhouse owned by cast members], and that was a lot of fun. Not so much wild. It wasn't eating breakfast off a hooker's stomach, like the Rat Pack—or at least I wasn't there for that. It wasn't as wild as people think.

JS: If you could recruit anyone, dead or alive, in or out of public life, to run as the Democratic presidential candidate, who would it be?

AF: [Illinois Sen.] Barak Obama. I think he's brilliant. He's a healer. He's a breath of fresh air. My ticket is Barak and [New York Attorney General] Eliot Spitzer.

JS: Spitzer looks like a shifty weasel, though.

AF: I know, but if you hear him talk and look at what he's done, he's a hard-charging attorney general who isn't afraid to go after corporate corruption.

JS: President Bush apparently has this habit of giving everyone he's met for five minutes a nickname. What do you think his nickname for you is?

AF: Probably something like "Big Al." He's not very imaginative. Maybe "Funny Guy."

JS: Who would you least like to be stuck on an elevator with: Bill O'Reilly, Bill Maher, Larry King or Charlie Rose?

AF: That's easy. Bill O'Reilly.

JS: Favorite Republicans?

AF: Let's see. I guess I'd have to say Jim Leach and Sherman Bullard in the House. I can't quite figure out why they identify themselves as Republicans. In the Senate, [John] McCain, and [Chuck] Hegel and Lindsay Graham, although I still don't totally trust any of them. I don't know Hegel at all, but McCain and Graham I got to know a little bit, and both have very good qualities.

JS: Did Rush Limbaugh ever call you to say thanks or drop you a nice note?

AF: I've got to give him a lot of credit. Compared to O'Reilly, he really handled the whole thing well. I had my editor send him a copy of Rush Limbaugh is a Big Fat Idiot and Other Observations about a month before it came out, with a note saying, "Dear Rush, Al thinks it would help sales if you mentioned it on your show." And he just didn't. Whereas O'Reilly sued me, which was just the best thing ever. [Laughs.] Arianna Huffington said to me, "It's as if O'Reilly walked up to you and handed you a check for a million dollars."

JS: What do you think the future of gay marriage is?

AF: In 40 years, we're all gonna look bac at this period and say, "Oh, that was en barrassing," the same way we look back states that banned interracial marriage. S my argument is just, "Let's spare ourselv the embarrassment."

JS: Who's the sexiest person in politics?

AF: Geez, oof. I'd go right to [Nanc Pelosi. She's a good-lookin' woman.

JS: Any advice for Mitt Romney?

AF: Well, if you're going to be governor a state, don't trash it all the time.

JS: Who's more polarizing, Bill or Hillary Clinton?

AF: Well, they're a package, in a way, but Hillary runs, it'll be her, because she'll in the race. But she made a good point saying that the most polarizing figure America is George Bush, and he did qu well with it.

JS: When do you think the first woman will be elected president?

AF: It may happen in 2008.

JS: How do you do three hours of talk radio per day?

AF: We do a lot of research. We have a of guests. There's a tremendous amount news. Actually, believe it or not, we find hard to jam everything into three hours

JS: Ever get tired of the sound of your own voice?

AF: I don't hear it so much as it just com out of my mouth. I don't listen to tapes the show. That would be hard.

JS: Last question. Can I have a daily affirmation, please?

AF: OK, close your eyes and repeat af me. "Hi, Jonathan. I am fun to be with write for THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN, whi is a great publication. And I'm go enough. I'm smart enough. And doggo it, I live in Beantown." Now, do you f better? IB

The Ultimate TESTOSTERONE TEST

We stage the first-ever Manlympics to find Boston's man among men.

BY EZRA DYER PHOTOGRAPHS BY JASON WALLENGREN

With all the media attention lavished on the emergence of the preening, eyebrow-plucking, belt-and-shoes–matching metrosexual, one would think that the old-fashioned male barbarian was extinct. Not so. I personally know many men who are barely more domesticated than the average hyena and wouldn't know Thomas Pink from Pink Floyd; men who command a mastery of traditional male talents—knowing how to sleep in a tree or set their own fractures; men who can even recite Ted Willams' second-best batting average off the top of their head. Believing it was time the denizens of this particular cave enjoyed some well deserved recognition, I conceived a series of challenges to determine, empirically, who is the manliest man around (or at least, that I could find). Our contestants, in no particular order, are: Andy, a cop and stand-up comedian; Whits, a prep-school admissions officer and sex-ed teacher; Doyle, an MBA at a research firm with a head for numbers and smashing beer cans; and Tim, a financial manager at Bank of America whose hockey equipment can often be smelled throughout Boston despite the fact that he lives in Nashua.

As to the best ways to challenge this bunch, many ideas were considered, from a blindfolded sense-of-direction test to Whits' suggestion that everyone's body hair be shaved and weighed. In the end I settled on five contests that together will give a balanced and scientific assessment of each contestant's overall manliness: IKEA furniture assembly, football-throwing accuracy, sports-trivia knowledge, nail-hammering speed and pain tolerance as determined by eating the ludicrously hot Dave's Insanity Sauce. We gather one Sunday at the Cambridge Center for Adult Education. Let the games begin.

1 The Dresser Mess

IKEA helpfully provided our "some assembly required" project, which we thought would involve something simple, like a small bookcase—the kind of furniture where the only tool needed is that little hex wrench that comes bundled with the screws and stuff. Instead, our men open their boxes to discover the Kirkenes five-drawer dresser, a behemoth whose assembly requires both a screwdriver and a hammer. This nearly puts us in a bad spot, since I didn't bring any tools, but Doyle comes to the rescue: In a show of manly preparedness, he's brought his own tool box, complete with several manually powered screwdrivers, a hammer and the piece de resistance, a hefty Black & Decker power screwdriver. Doyle's tool box also includes a nip bottle of Yukon Jack whiskey, which is helpful, though not technically required, for putting together the Kirkenes dresser.

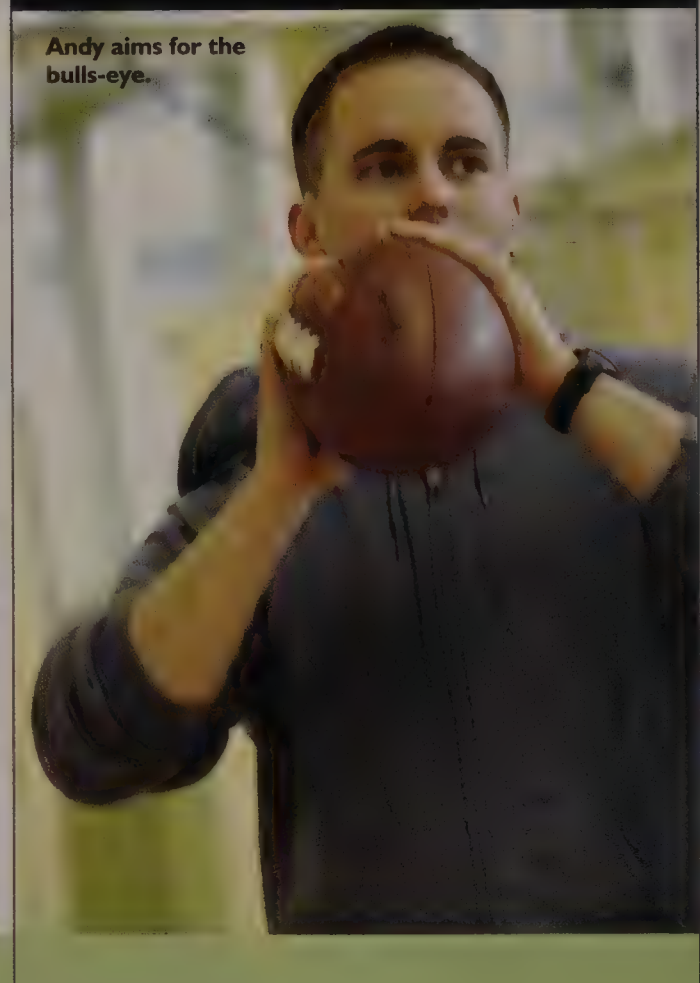
Boxes open, men at their stations, I start the clock and the contestants confront their sleek Swedish nemeses, all 200-plus parts' worth. Andy takes an early lead as I scurry around the room with the power screwdriver, lending help as it's needed. Somewhere along the way, the constant crouching and sprinting causes me to pull my right hamstring, but I must persevere. Showing any weakness in this crowd would put me at high risk of receiving a noogie, a purple nurple, or the dreaded Atomic Wedgie.

When the 30-minute mark arrives, the dressers are looking tantalizingly close to completion. But Andy and Tim, both leaders at different points, hit setbacks when they learn the hard way that the sides of the drawers can be installed backwards. This is especially damaging to Tim, who's devised an "assembly line" method, skipped a few steps in the instructions and put together all the drawers at once, which would've been brilliant if he hadn't done it wrong. Even worse, the peanut gallery of significant others (read: women) watching the proceedings have all noticed that he screwed up, but have been forbidden to tell him. This allows Doyle to grab a narrow lead. Whits always seems to be a few steps behind, but he compensates for his lack of speed by making the most noise with the hammer and sweating profusely.

At 56 minutes, 26 seconds, Doyle screws in his final drawer knob and takes a victorious pull of Yukon Jack. Tim finishes less than two minutes later—his assembly-line bungle cost him the victory. Andy, the early leader, takes third exactly 10 minutes later, and Whits calls it a day shortly thereafter. His dresser has no knobs, but he's had enough. Since this furniture is for charity, I tell him not to worry about it—some orphans will just have a knobless dresser.



Andy aims for the bulls-eye.

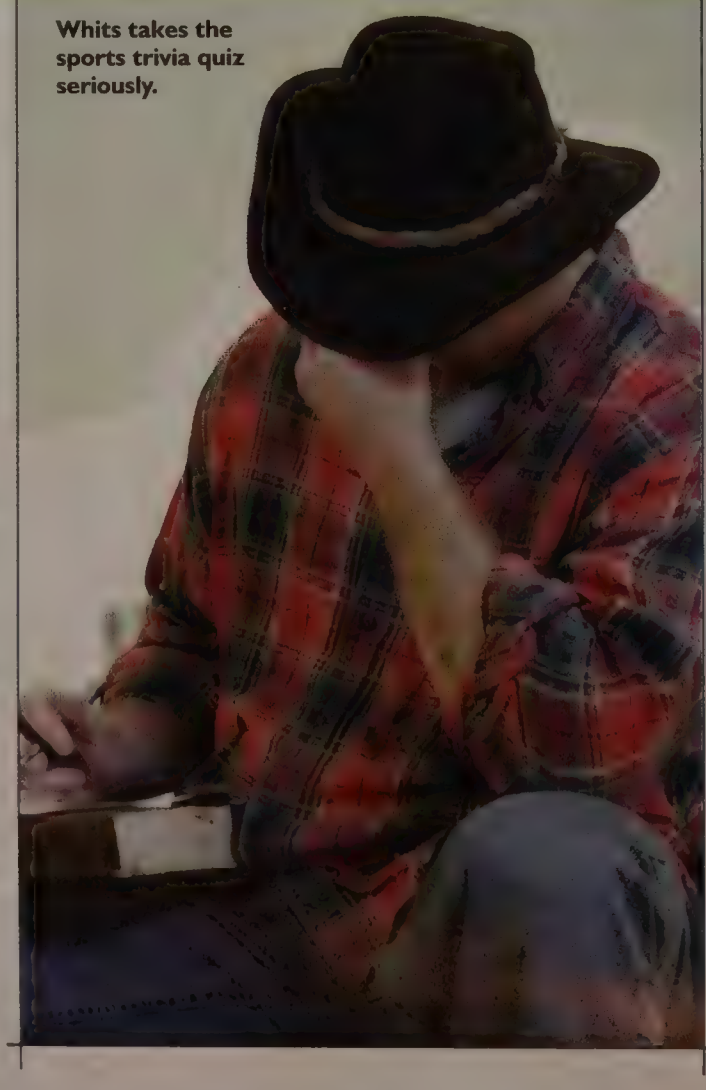
2 Downward Spiral

Next up, the Football Toss. Any man should know how to accurately throw a football. We're not demanding an 80 m.p.h. spiral here, but what if you someday enter one of those contests where you go out on the field at halftime and have to hit a target with a pass to win a million dollars? Plus, chicks dig a guy who can throw a football real good; just look at Tom Brady. This is an important life skill.

I draw a bulls-eye on a sheet of letter-size paper and place a hammer on the floor about 15 feet away. Everyone must treat the hammer as the line of scrimmage. This setup is designed to mimic hitting a receiver (albeit a static one) right in the numbers on a short out pattern.

Whits takes the snap first, and out of 10 tosses he hits his guy three times—not bad. Doyle's up next and manages only two completions, though one of them has enough mustard on it to knock the hanging target right off the wall. (That one would've been dropped by a Seahawks receiver.) Tim, with a smooth delivery reminiscent of Scott Zolak, grabs the ball and hits his guy four times to move into the lead. It's up to Andy to dethrone Tim, but despite tight spirals he only manages to tie Doyle, forcing a throw-off for third place, which is won by the dresser-assembly maestro. After two rounds, Tim has a first-place and a second-place finish, and he looks like our emerging Tower of Testosterone.

> The question nobody gets is, "In what oft-banned barroom sport do the competitors land on air mattresses?" The answer, of course, is dwarf-tossing.



Whits takes the sports trivia quiz seriously.

3 My Sports Knowledg Dwarfs Yours

We move to the Trivial Pursuit Sports Category Ch lenge. Any man worth his back hair will tell you t the easiest piece of pie in Trivial Pursuit is the Spo category, variously identified as the green or ora questions. To a man, landing on a sports question Trivial Pursuit is like writing your name on the S This is our bread and butter. This we can do.

I select 12 questions, trying to evenly cover the f major pro sports as well as a few random ones. The o question that nobody gets is, "In what oft-banned b room sport do the harnessed competitors land on mattresses?" The answer, of course, is dwarf-tossing, guess we can safely assume that none of our men ever tossed a dwarf, which is sort of disappointi (Note to self: Find a dwarf and an air mattress if we this story again next year.)

The question that causes the most visible frust tion of the "I know it but can't think of it" vari asks which NFL star collapsed at practice and rushed to the hospital with a temperature of 108 grees. Doyle not only gets it right—Korey Stringe but even spells his name correctly. Unsurprisingly, two front-runners, Doyle and Tim, for first with eight correct answ apiece, prompting a tiebreaker t somehow manages to involve anot dwarf question (obsessions with biz topics are a Trivial Pursuit traditio After neither can guess the maxim allowable height for competitors at World Dwarf Games—4'10"—Tim ta the victory by correctly identifying luge as the event in the Wi Olympics that somebody once compa to a laxative. Whits takes third pl and Andy once again finishes at back of the pack.

4 Hammer Time

The hammer is the most manly of hand tools. Yo got a handle connected to a blunt piece of steel th used to pound things, it makes a lot of noise and dangerous despite its simplicity. I love hammers, you can tell a lot about a man by the way he han one. If a guy can't pound a nail in a reasonable am of time without knocking it sideways or crippling h self, he's probably never tried to jam a turkey car down a garbage disposal, and he might shave his leg

For our purposes, I've procured four 3½–inch n and two thick boards. The goal is to nail the board gether, completely pounding in the nail, in the sho time possible. I set the nails so they're straight, and guy selects one through the time-honored traditio placing his finger atop it. Andy volunteers to set first time and takes the hammer in hand. After I him a countdown and start the timer, he becomes a of steel-pounding fury. A mere 7.43 seconds late nail is done. With a seemingly tough time to beat, i pears this event may pull Andy back into contentio

But Doyle's up next, and using a bizarre metho short, lightning-quick taps, he drives his nail hom 5.37 seconds. Like Vince Young's arm motion, Doyle Technique looks unconventional and a bi but it gets the job done. Tim takes the opposite proach, throwing great haymakers that miss the n often as they hit it. When they land, Tim's strike eadly effective, but when he's done the board around his ail is covered in elephant footprints and 8.1 seconds ave elapsed. This leaves Whits, who goes down on his ght knee and places his left foot on the board next to the ail, presumably for stability. Is this a good idea?

Apparently, it's a great idea. Every single one of Whits' rokes hits the nail square on the head, and he finishes in ı astounding 2.9 seconds—less than one second for each ıch of nail driven. After his last-place finish in the IKEA ;sembly, Whits has stormed back into this contest like a bid bull running the streets of Pamplona.

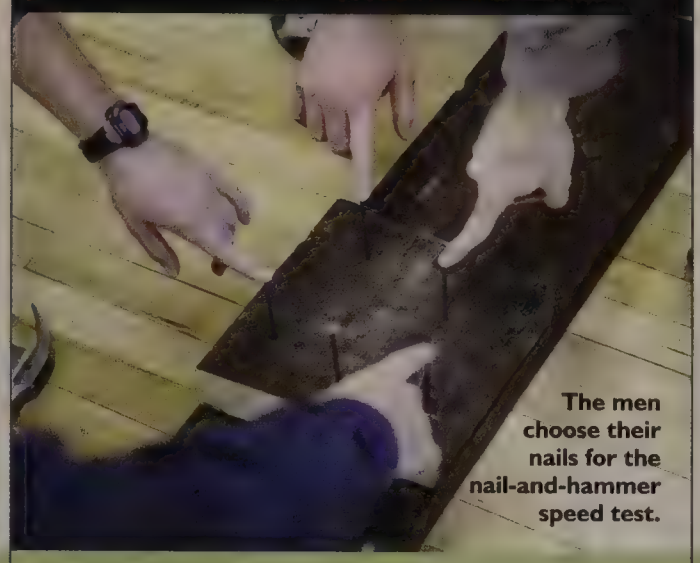
5 Pleading Insanity or those who've never had the pleasure of sting Dave's Insanity Sauce, allow me to ovide a bit of background. If you enjoy icy food, you can add one drop of Insanity , say, a jar of pasta sauce, and it'll be pleasıtly hot. Add two drops, and it'll get stargly hot. Three drops and you're into ueasant, four drops and you may as well row it all away and start over. One guy I ıow calls Dave's Insanity Sauce "Dave's ce-Ruiner." The side of the bottle contains e warning, "Use this product one drop at a ne. Keep away from eyes, pets and chilen. Not for people with heart/respiratory oblems." I love hot food to the point that I nce sent back a restaurant's "Suicide ings" and told the waitress that they were really only a for help, but Dave's Insanity Sauce scares me.

So it is with no little apprehension that I gather the en around a table and present them with their final allenge: They will eat pasta laced with Insanity. Before ch of them is a glass of cold milk. Whoever drinks first ll take last place, and so on. I load the pasta with Insani because this needs to happen quickly, since Whits is ning late for another appointment. (He and some 300-pund-plus friends are having a weigh-in and body f–measuring party, complete with calipers, to set a basele for their own Biggest Loser–type weight-loss contest. Whits is a busy man on Sundays once fantasy-football season ends.)

To establish that I've made the pasta hot enough, I take e first bite. Almost immediately, my lips are numb, I'm Hcuping and my nose is running. Each breath is fire. I swig me milk but it barely helps. Yep, this is gonna be good. fter seeing my reaction, Doyle takes about half an hour to sbol his vermicelli onto his fork to assure he doesn't have ce more strand than anyone else. And with that, it's on.

I figure Andy has the advantage in this one because, aa cop, he's been exposed to pepper spray. Compared wh a dose of pepper spray, eating Insanity should be at lst seven percent less painful. And, a minute or so in, Andy looks the most comfortable. His eyes are getting rd, but he's casually leaning back in his chair and staring down the competition like it ain't no thing. Doyle's whole face is red and he's rocking back and forth like Hoffman in Rain Man. "I feel like a dragon," says Tim. Whits doesn't look so good but says, "I'm not drinking the milk not because this isn't ridiculously hot, but because of my silly sense of competitiveness." At that, Tim ups the ante by suddenly eating the rest of his pasta. "Whoa. That brought the heat right back," he says. Five minutes pass and nobody's caving. That means I have to add the dose.

I coat the pasta to the point that the tomato sauce is reclored by the dark red of the Insanity Sauce. I wonder if this is dangerous. "I researched this online before we came over here," says Doyle. "It can only kill you if it gets in your lungs." I advise everyone to keep it out of their lungs and dig in for round two. Perhaps their mouths are already numbed from the first round, but 10 minutes later nobody is giving in. This, I must say, is a truly tough bunch of bastards. Doyle offers an idea that's sure to end the standoff. "Down South, people discipline their kids with 'hot shots,'" he says. "Basically, you put some hot sauce right on a spoon and make them eat it." I find some plastic spoons. The idea of eating Insanity straight off a spoon is itself an indication of insanity, but in a gesture of solidarity I cowboy up and join the table. Like cultists cracking our cyanide capsules, we resign ourselves to whatever awaits us, and the Insanity goes down the hatch. Surprise! Drinking Insanity straight isn't as bad as eating it with food, maybe because it doesn't stay in your mouth as long. (I'm pretty sure we'll all pay the price tomorrow, though.) But now I'm really perplexed. How are we gonna end this thing?



The men choose their nails for the nail-and-hammer speed test.

> A minute or so in, Andy looks the most comfortable. His eyes are getting red, but he's casually leaning back in his chair and staring down the competition like it ain't no thing.

Tim "toasts" the competitors with spicy pasta in the hot sauce test.

Doyle zens out in the hot sauce challenge.

Someone suggests a chugging contest. Excellent. Everyone will chug the milk they've been eyeing for so long and, to keep things honest, overturn the cup on top of their heads when they're done. Andy ends up getting screwed out of winning his best event, as his hands are shaking so badly from the massive Insanity ingestion that he can hardly hold his cup. Whits wins, followed by Tim and Doyle. I didn't think it would end like this, but I didn't imagine everyone would be able to withstand huge doses of Insanity without giving in. As Doyle says, it came down to willpower. "There was just no way I was going to drink that milk," he says. I think if someone had given in first, others would've followed suit, but everyone would rather suffer than be the first to succumb to the pain. How stupid. How macho. How manly.

And Our Winner Is…

It's time to crown the winner of the first-ever Ultimate Testosterone Test. Coming in fourth, we have Andy, who put in a valiant effort but was surpassed by a trio of first-rate meatheads. As a prize, he gets a pink Barbie dress and a can of cologne, to aid his game with the ladies. Since real men don't follow the latest trend, I bought a tried-and-true classic scent: Deep Woods Off. Of his performance, Andy says, "Great. I drive a Honda Element—I already get made fun of enough."

We have a tie for second place. Our third-place finisher was to receive a pair of three-pound dumbbells, the better to start developing his girly little muscles. Second place, as the motivational posters tell us, is first loser, so coming in second here nets a pretty copy of Wedding Flowers magazine, to remind our man that he has work yet to do. These prizes are fought over by Doyle and Whits, which, if you've been following, means our winner's name rhymes with "gym" "him" and probably some other manly words as well.

Tim won the football and trivia categories and came in second in the IKEA and Insanity contests, and this was enough to surmount his last-place hammer finish. For his efforts, Tim gets to keep the football, which I suggest he use as the centerpiece on a custom championship belt to be worn everywhere he goes for the next year. Instead he gives the ball to Andy, who resolves to practice and return to kick everyone's ass next time. But for now, if someone asks you the name of the manliest man you know, you can confidently reply that there are some who call him… Tim. IB

A GUY'S GUIDE TO GRUB

HOW TO EAT POORLY WITH ZERO GRAMS OF GUILT

BY RICH LEVINE PHOTOGRAPHS BY KATIE NOBLE

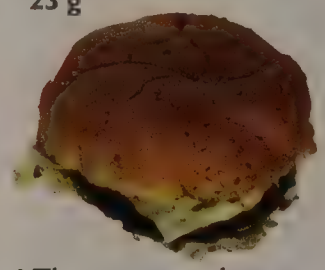
Ladies, it's not your boyfriend's fault. It really isn't. Blame the celebrities. We men marveled over Catherine Zeta-Jones falling in love with old man Michael Douglas. We sat in disbelief as Julia Roberts fell for lantern-jawed Lyle Lovett—pompadour, acne scars and all. Angelina and Billy Bob? Yeah, we caught that one too.

The secret's out: When it comes to the opposite sex, you're just far less appearance-conscious than we are, and for that reason it shouldn't come as a surprise that daily gym regimens and calorie-counting aren't always our top priorities. But that's not to say we don't try and stay a little fit for you. We'll jog from the T stop to our office and call it a workout; every once in a while we'll do a set or two of crunches during the commercials of a Red Sox or Pats game (unless it's nationally televised—they go to commercials too often); and starting now, when we sit down at a diner at 2:30 on a Saturday morning or need a quick snack on the way to work, we're going to make the healthy choice (or at least the healthiest one available), and we're going to do it all for you.

That's because, with a little help (OK, a lot) from Mike D'Angelo, personal trainer, exercise physiologist and founder of Body Evolver Fitness and Training on Boylston Street, we got the skinny on the best of the bad foods.

TWO SLICES OF PIZZA VS. CHEESEBURGER

Two slices of Domino's cheese pizza (regular crust)		Cheeseburger with lettuce and grilled onions
750	Calories	440
22 g	Fat	24 g
110 g	Carbs	36 g
30 g	Protein	23 g



D'Angelo's take: I'd eat the cheeseburger. Why? The protein and veggies. Pizza has few benefits, except maybe a little from the cheese. The white flour in the crust spikes glucose levels in your blood, and tomato sauces typically are loaded with sugar. With the burger, you're at least getting quality protein with the fat. A little bit of fat—even saturated—is healthy, though unsaturated is better. The bread isn't great, but it has fewer carbs than the pizza. So eat the burger, top it with lettuce and grilled onions, and use mustard instead of ketchup, which is loaded with sugar. Even better: Eat it open-faced, with only half the white-flour bun.

CHICKEN CAESAR SALAD VS. GRILLED CHEESE SANDWICH

Chicken Caesar salad

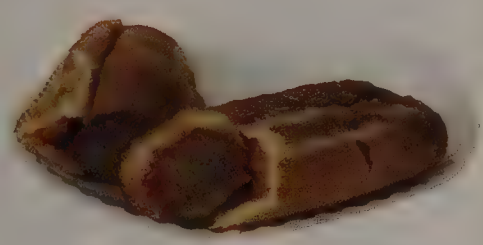
Grilled cheese sandwich

Chicken Caesar salad		Grilled cheese sandwich
541	Calories	510
34 g	Fat	30 g
15 g	Carbs	40 g
37 g	Protein	19 g

D'Angelo's take: Go for the chicken Caesar salad with dressing on the side. The salad has more of what you need (fiber and protein) and less of what you don't (empty calories). The fiber is great for filling you up, and chicken is a lean form of protein. A little of the dressing should go a long way; it's the one thing that takes the "health" out of the Caesar salad, so use it sparingly and you'll have yourself a decent meal. A better choice is to order a greener salad, like a house salad with balsamic vinaigrette, with a side of chicken. The vinaigrette is a tasty and lower-calorie choice and has the healthy unsaturated fat in it, as opposed to the creamy Caesar dressing, which has saturated fat. Try using only a little dressing on your salad and keep the rest on the side for backup.

CHICKEN PARM OVER ZITI
VS.
MEATBALL SUB

Chicken parm over ziti		Meatball sub
1,026	Calories	586
35 g	Fat	27 g
117 g	Carbs	50 g
60 g	Protein	36 g



D'Angelo's take: Look at the calories in the chicken parmesan over ziti! From a calorie standpoint alone, the meatball sub is a better choice. The chicken is breaded, fried in oil and layered with cheese; then comes a big carb load in the form of ziti. Instead, order chicken, broccoli and ziti and eat only half the ziti. Request the chicken baked or grilled, not fried. Broccoli speaks for itself: packed with great nutrients and loaded with fiber, so it's filling.

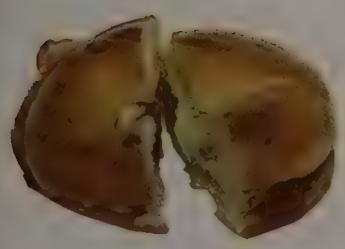
BIG MAC
VS.
CHICKEN MCNUGGETS

Big Mac		Chicken McNuggets w/ honey-mustard sauce
560	Calories	485
30 g	Fat	25 g
47 g	Carbs	40 g
25 g	Protein	25 g

D'Angelo's take: I'd have to go with the nuggets, but without the honey-mustard sauce. Dip them in regular mustard instead, a lower-calorie but still flavorful option. Obviously, neither the nuggets nor the burger is very good for you. A better fast food choice is the grilled chicken sandwich. Get two sandwiches, take one of the pieces of chicken out (throw the bun away) and stuff the chicken into the other sandwich. Top with veggies and mustard.

BACON, EGG & CHEESE BAGEL
VS.
CHOCOLATE DONUT & COFFEE

Bacon, egg & cheese bagel (plain bagel)		Chocolate donut & coffee
461	Calories	308
19 g	Fat	15 g
53 g	Carbs	44 g
22 g	Protein	4 g



D'Angelo's take: Grab the bacon, egg and cheese; there's too much straight sugar in the donut and coffee. But be careful, because these numbers reflect a medium-sized bagel. Some large bagels start at 460 calories before adding the bacon, egg and cheese. A better option? Go with turkey, egg and cheese on a wheat bagel. Turkey is better than ham or bacon for quality, nutrient-dense protein, and the wheat bagel, with its more-beneficial complex carbs, trumps a plain white bagel.

SIX-PACK OF ULTRALIGHT BEER
VS.
FOUR JACK & WATERS

Six-pack of ultralight beer		Four Jack & waters
580	Calories	316
0 g	Fat	0 g
15.6 g	Carbs	0 g
0 g	Protein	0 g

D'Angelo's take: When you're out on the town drinking, eat light and eat clean. Choose your calories: Either drink them or eat them, but don't do both. And in this case, I'm reaching for Jack. Beverages of this sort are high in alcohol sugar, which increases the calories (alcohol sugar is seven calories per gram). If you're going to eat, focus on protein and veggies, then drink your carbs. Just make sure that your booze isn't mixed with sugar—cola, fruit juices, mixers. You want a tip to nip that hangover in the bud? When you get home, eat pickles and drink water. The combination of sodium in the pickles and water helps to rehydrate your body, particularly your brain. Also, quality alcohol is less hangover-inducing than cheap booze. So treat yourself and drink the good stuff!

There you have it. And girls, keep this story handy for the next time you're about to give your boyfriend an earful as he mows down a burger with a side of nuggets and a liter of Jack. Take a deep breath, re-read and remember to lay off. He's trying to be healthy. IB

THE MANLIES

Macho, Macho Men. And food, and cars, and sports.

BY SAM WALTERS

These deserve a spot in the testosterone hall of fame.

Day in and day out, men fart, drive preposterously oversized vehicles and beat the hell out of each other, to little recognition. Some men have even grown so ashamed of their true, base natures that they've turned to metrosexuality. Well, I say stand up and be proud of your emotionally retarded selves! Therefore I give you the Manlies: awards to recognize greatness in the field of masculinity. Categories were chosen according to man's eight fundamental desires: enjoying sports; watching TV; eating; drinking; showing off our rides; growing barbaric facial hair; "appreciating" women; and simply acting like men (angry baboons). Winners were calculated using this highly scientific formula: manliness = [testosterone – brain cells x (beer + nachos)] ÷ whipped-ness. (In cases where only the winner is discussed, the other nominees were too weak to survive and deserve no mention.) And away we go!

MANLIEST SPORT:

Certainly, a great case can be made for football—the only sport where players wear helmets to protect themselves from the other players' helmets—or lacrosse, which is football with weapons. But the trophy goes to hockey, which is football with weapons, played on razor sharp skates, on a sheet of ice (you can end up with a concussion and an ice cream headache). This is a sport where an athlete who still has all his teeth is regarded as a drag queen by his peers. And large peers they are: I saw the recently departed former Bruins captain Joe Thornton at The Place once, and the man was a mountain. I didn't know people from Ontario came in that size. The thought of that Northern moose barreling toward me at 40 mph with a club in his hand and knives on his feet makes me want to drop to my knees and sing "O Canada" for mercy.

MANLIEST TELEVISION SHOW:

Pro wrestling? American Chopper? The History Channel's Gonads of War? Hell no. These shows resemble a performance of The Nutcracker compared with the undisputed champion, World's Wildest Police Chases. Week in and week out, this fine program showcases the cream of the hot-rodding crop and the cops who can't get enough of them. True, the only thing more reprehensible than bombing down the road in a car with no regard for life is watching it on TV for kicks, but it still takes bravado! In the most incredible episode, a deranged man steals a tank from an armory and drives it onto the highway. When the tank tries to break down the barrier into oncoming traffic, fearless police clamber onto it, shoot open the hatch and toss a grenade inside (some of Saving Private Ryan may be creeping into my memory here). I'm waiting for the episode where Saddam Hussein breaks out of prison, hijacks an aircraft carrier and is eventually sunk by a SWAT team on windsurfers.

MANLIEST MEAL:

Weighing in at 1½ gut-busting pounds, Swanson's Hungry Man XXL Backyard BBQ Meal takes the cake, the pizza, the steak-and-cheese sub and any other claimants to the throne of un-health, and sits on them. Comprising a dump truck's worth of mashed potatoes, plus two chicken and two pork patties glazed in what looks to be crude oil, this culinary monstrosity has been branded a crime against humanity by the American Heart Association. Indeed, during a test meal I had to have an EMT administer CPR just to pump the sludge through my arteries. Some thought could have been given to dessert, but I'll bet they couldn't fit so much as another pea into the bulging box the dinner comes in. Still, I'm sure the scientists at Swanson Labs are right now devising an asphalt crème brûlée to complement the meal.

MANLIEST DRINK:

The award goes to Guinness Extra Stout, an obvious choice but nonetheless undeniable. While the brewery was founded in 1759, Guinness as we know it was created in 1803 when a disgruntled employee named Seamus McBlasted attempted to sabotage a batch by substituting coal for hops, creating a beverage so opaque it can bounce lightning. Ironically, the Irish—being categorically insane—thought it was "brilliant!" To be sure, Guinness is smooth and creamy. But then so is kerosene, which, as it happens, is slightly less alcoholic than Guinness. If you crave something even stronger, I recommend a concoction invented by my disreputable friend Frank "The Ghetto Ninja" called Black Death: a double shot of espresso poured into a pint of Guinness. Chasing an upper with a downer makes for some exciting heart confusion! Yes, stimulants and depressants flow together like the River Phoenix…

MANLIEST VEHICLE:

What weighs nearly 12,000 lbs, has 22 forward and 11 reverse gears and could drive to China via the center of the Earth? The Unimog, you puny human! Engineered by Mercedes-Benz, the Unimog is part-SUV, part-truck and all behemoth; even the name "Unimog" sounds like some god-of-old who keeps company with the likes of Cthulhu and Nagoob. ("Bow before Unimog! ROAAARRR!!") The Unimog can be outfitted with a crane, a wheat thresher, and probably a giant hammer to smash any pitiful Hummer competitors it encounters. Technically a military or utility vehicle, it's a matter of days before Will Smith buys a fleet of them and sets off a fad that will leave us dependent on oil from the Middle East for at least another century.

MANLIEST FACIAL HAIR:

Even Tom Selleck's mustache has nothing on this category's champion, the Kaiser. The easiest description is a thick beard, but with the chin shaved off, leaving serious muttonchops connecting to a bristling mustache (the bearer should look part-boar). A popular 'do among the spiked-helmet, Harley-riding set, the hair on the Kaiser should be combed outward, and be harsh enough that should you miss spearing a rival gang member with your helmet spike, you might still impale him with your sideburns. I have sported the Kaiser on occasion, and I tell you men, it will make your chest swell with pride. It will also make it impossible for you to get laid, partly because women prefer that their lips remain non-perforated, but mostly because you'll look like a damned fool. In any case, the Kaiser is an excellent choice for those of you who aren't getting laid anyway, and could use an excuse… not that that's ever been my situation.

MANLIEST WOMAN:

Men are attracted to beauty, true. But most men also like women with a little man in them. (I'm talking about chutzpah, not an elf.) The victor, then, is Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon actor/martial artist/stuntwoman Michelle Yeoh. This iron lady can splinter your skull with a flying kick or dice you into tartare with a sword. She could simply smash you with her King Kong–sized cojones too, but that would look crude, and, manly or no, she's a lady. Granted, she's currently appearing in the not-so-manly Memoirs of a Geisha, but I once saw her in a Jackie Chan film ride a motorcycle off a cliff onto a moving train (no, really). And her training for all this? She used to be a ballerina. That's like me deciding to become a flame-eater because I get the Fire! hot sauce at Taco Bell.

MANLIEST MAN:

And the winner is… Clint Eastwood! The world's toughest grandfather, Eastwood is still kicking the baby-powdered asses of men 50 years his junior. How tough is the man? I recently bought a dirty sock of Eastwood's on eBay to collect a sample of his DNA, and the analysis revealed he's made of beef jerky and rocks. Eastwood did receive strong competition from Sean Connery, but a close look reveals Eastwood to be the worthier candidate. Compare Eastwood's and Connery's iconic characters, Dirty Harry and James Bond. Sure, Bond bedded women by the truckload. But is this really manly? It still entails touching, and touching is for sissies. Most importantly, an action character's firearm defines him, and Bond carried a Walther PPK, a pistol with the sound of the word "pee-pee" in it. Not good. Conversely, Dirty Harry carried a .357 Magnum, a gun so Ron Jeremy-esque they named an extra-large condom after it; you could improve on that only with a gun shaped like a stick of salami. Dirty Harry is so masculine, in the classic "Go ahead—make my day" scene, while leveling his cannon at some punk, he's even eating a hot dog! Phallic overload. Eastwood takes the prize. Thanks for playing. IB

DEAR PRUDENCE GIVES ADVICE TO MEN ON HANDLING THEIR MOST EMBARRASSING MOMENTS.

Stupid Is As Stupid Does

BY LESLIE KILGORE ILLUSTRATIONS BY ADRIANO THE PITILESS

Most of us have done some stupid things in our lives, but guys in particular seem to be masters of doing or saying the wrong thing at the wrong time. Painful blind dates, offensive behavior toward the opposite sex and awkward bathroom moments are just a few of the situations that continue to undo men. Promising them complete anonymity, we asked some local men to share their worst moments and how they handled them. Then we took those scenarios to a professional—etiquette expert and Cambridge resident Margo Howard, whose "Dear Prudence" column is moving from slate.com to Yahoo! News—and asked for her insight on how to handle those situations most guys hope to forget. Read and learn.

THE SISTER SWITCH

The scenario: Several years ago I was dating this amazing woman, a social worker from NYC. She was laid back, fun to be with and attractive, and she totally made me feel special, but there was something missing from our relationship, and I just couldn't put my finger on it. One weekend when my girlfriend was in Boston, she wanted me to meet her sister, who had recently moved to town. We arranged to pick the sister up and go to breakfast. Well, the moment we pulled up to the front door, I was blown away. I had to show amazing self-possession just to say, "Hello." She was unbelievable! She was a beautiful, high-powered professional, quick-witted and a total flirt. She took down my cell number at some point during breakfast and called me a few days later. We agreed to meet and got along amazingly. But since I was already dating her sister, I decided to introduce her to a friend of mine. When she told me she wasn't interested in my friend, I took that opportunity to tell her how I felt about her. She said she was confused. I was dating her sister and she didn't want to hurt her. Bottom line, I get a call the day after Thanksgiving from the woman I was dating screaming and crying, telling me what a complete jerk I was. Her sister, who I'd thought was so awesome, took the opportunity of the Thanksgiving holiday to share with her family and friends that her sister's boyfriend had made a move on her. She did it at the most inappropriate time! Needless to say, my girlfriend was upset and embarrassed, as were her parents.

Prudence responds: Too bad you didn't break it off with your then-girlfriend—the one who turned out to be the less interesting sister. I'm not sure why you didn't. You might then have had a shot with the wowser sister. While it still would have created a commotion in the family, at least you would have been seen as a straight shooter. These things do happen. You don't say if the social-worker sister is in your life today, but my guess would be no.

FLUSHED OUT

The scenario: I think my shit story falls into the realm of awkward situations. I recently spent the month in New Orleans doing some medical volunteer work. These very nice undergrad girls took me into their home and put me up for the month. On the day of my departure, after they had left to head to their respective homes for the Thanksgiving holiday, I found myself alone in the house for the first time in three weeks. Naturally, as any true man will know, there are two options in this situation. Since one of those had been greatly fulfilled numerous times during the course of my stay, I chose the second path, which was to finally take a leisurely morning dump in peace and quiet, and not have to worry about some girl walking into the bathroom a minute later. But after I got up to flush, lo and behold, I realized the water in the house was shut off, and my deposit in the bottom of the bowl was not going anywhere. What was I to do? My cab's coming in 30 minutes, these girls will be away for a week and the fing toilet won't flush. Is this any way to thank them for their wonderful hospitality? Since there was no water to fill the bowl with, and I had to catch my plane home, I made the executive decision to just take off and play dumb—maybe they'd blame it on the construction workers. So I bounced. I haven't heard of it since, but I can only imagine what became of that monstrous dump after a week of festering in the toilet...

Prudence responds: This is gross to contemplate, but you cannot be the only person in the world to have been in this situation, or a similar one—say, a broken toilet instead of the water being turned off. I doubt that the girls spent much time trying to dope out who, exactly, was the miscreant. What you should do, to be both correct and to salve your conscience, is write the girls a note thanking them for taking you in. There is really no point in fessing up to what was left behind, because it will have been quite plain that the absence of water created the, uh, difficulty.

DESSERT DESERTION

The scenario: I had a blind dinner date with a woman in downtown Boston, someone I frequently talked to over the phone for my job. We seemed to get along fine in those conversations, so we decided to meet for dinner and drinks. Right off the bat she wasn't what I expected from her description of herself. While waiting for a table, I ran into an old girlfriend from college who told me she was going out to a club. During dinner with my blind date, I excused myself to go to the bathroom, snuck out of the restaurant and met my ex at the club. Needless to say, I avoided calling my blind date from work ever again.

Prudence responds: I don't imagine this woman was waiting by the phone. I know I sound like an Indian shaman, but put yourself in this woman's shoes. How perfectly insulting and deflating to be left in the lurch. If you felt you absolutely couldn't get through the evening, you would've been better off—and so would she—if you'd said that her self-description was at odds with what you viewed as reality, and unfortunately expecting one thing and finding another had killed the evening for you. Then you should've offered to see her home, or bid her good night, and then gone on to the club. I suspect you already know this, but a first-rate person would have slogged through the evening, somehow, rather than inflict such a painful rejection on another person.

FENWAY FOIST

The scenario: I recently was fixed up on a blind date. We sat down to dinner at a Spanish restaurant. She was very pretty, but my taste in women is quite specific. Nonetheless, I'm open-minded, and gave her exactly 60 seconds to turn into an Asian physicist from Mexico. She didn't. I insisted we go to the Red Sox game where my friend Larry was. His taste in women is not specific. She learned this lesson five times that night. I would've gotten away with it, but she'll probably find out about the scheme when it's published in the IMPROPER.

Prudence responds: You're very funny and, happily, self-aware. I see your situation as no harm, no foul. You did the most constructive thing you could do: put her in a situation where her chances of interesting someone else were pretty good. Introductions are always welcome—and you never had to actually let her know that she wasn't your type. (At least you didn't leave her in a restaurant.) I hope you finally found your Asian physicist from Mexico.

HEAVY METAL HEARTBREAK

The scenario: I've never been good with important dates. Once, in high school, my first girlfriend approached me and asked if I knew what today was. "Yes!" I answered excitedly. "What?" she said. "It's the day... the new Iron Maiden record comes out!" Apparently, it was also our first-year anniversary. We split up that night. I was heartbroken, and the record really sucked.

Prudence responds: I can see how that might upset a high-school girl, but an older married woman would laugh. Well... some would. Men famously have to be reminded of special dates, so that's what women do: We remind them. I suspect that, because of that episode, rotten record or not, you are quite conscientious about anniversaries now. iB

AN IMPASSIONED PORTRAIT

Caroline Healey Dall's Daughter of Boston, edited by Helen R. Deese, is the diary of a 19th-century woman.

In the 75 years that Caroline Healey Dall kept her diary (she lived from 1822–1912), Boston was a center of intellectual, political and social ferment. Intellectually encouraged by her father, she was pulled in the opposite direction by her troubled mother. Although she married a minister who ultimately abandoned her and their children, she became a vital participant in and observer of the abolitionist movement and Transcendentalism, and she went on to forge a career as a lecturer and publisher of pamphlets on women's rights. She consorted, sometimes rivalrously, with the towering figures of the day: Bronson Alcott, Emerson, Thoreau, Margaret Fuller, Elizabeth Peabody. Disputing an inference by Emerson that Fuller's influence was sexual, Dall muses: "Certainly the vigor lay partly in the hot current of her blood." Of Elizabeth Peabody, Dall remarks, "I love to hear her talk—to see her smile. So deep learning, so youthful joyousness, so great experience and perfect simplicity." Once she helped a young slavegirl write a sort of Dear John letter. Dall was impassioned, observant, at times in high defensive dudgeon, and—for all her independent feminist fire—she was susceptible to the wounds of love. There's iron in her energy. Her diaries are often chatty yet fascinating in their formidable purpose.

OH! DE PARFUM

Colonial Drug, at 49 Brattle St. in Harvard Square, sells fancy European perfumes, aftershaves, Mason Pearson hairbrushes and soaps and shampoos for men and women (617-864-2222).

The seasoned age—almost 60—of this shop selling quintessentially aristocratic perfumes is surpassed only by the age of some of the companies whose perfumes and balms it sells: Creed, for example, was founded in 1760. More than 1,000 classic, mostly European brands proffer rarefied, vibrant sniffing. You can sample from over 30 and choose varying grades of a scent from eau de parfum on down. At-the-ready, scent-scholarly information falls from the lips of owner-siblings J.P. and Cathy Botindari, who respond to their many shoppers' anxious questions. What pleasure to see bottles of such classics as Joy, Rive Gauche, L'Heure Bleue and L'Air Du Temps; they simply breathe romance and privilege. But also what pleasure to be instructed in the flavors and notes of other perfumes like Robert Piguet and Keiko Mecheri, or to learn that Sou Verte perfume contains orange flower, freesia, muguet and tomato leaf—and comes with a green t mouse. Clan Forbes, which dates back to 1445, offers perfumes and aftershaves that come wrapped in rious-looking plaid. Beautiful and thick badger brushes with horn handles come in differentiated gra that are sought by shaving cognoscenti. Informed shoppers cruise foreign-born shampoos like hon colored Pears soap and exotic toothpastes like Vademecum. It's Little Europe here: high-class sl creams, 50-hour aromatic candles and wonderful service.

REVIEW

EARLY ADDITION

South Kitchen & Wine Bar delivers upscale flavor to a changing neighborhood.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY ANTHONY TIEULI

Ocean perch served with white-wine sauce and market vegetables

Is gentrification a curse or a blessing? A plague or a cure? The question may be academic in South Boston, as gentrification sweeps through just as it has already swept through much of Charlestown. Both of these traditionally working class, ethnically tribal enclaves contain old housing stock, formerly prosaic structures rapidly being resurrected after years of neglect, with the much celebrated (or lamented) yuppies providing a ready market for restored houses and condo conversions. Yuppies, being young and professional, are often hungry and usually too busy to cook. What they lack in time, though, they make up in disposable income, and so new restaurants accompany gentrification as night follows day.

Enter South Kitchen & Wine Bar, near the intersection of East and West Broadway, the epicenter of South Boston. Its high, black ceiling contrasts with blonde wooden booths, banquettes and paneled room dividers, creating comfortable, semi-private spaces. A short staircase leads to a second level and an interior dining room for private parties. Large picture windows with narrow transom windows above let in plenty of sunlight during the day. Illumination in the evening comes from simple yet handsome hanging light fixtures suspended on elegantly curved supports. Paintings by local artists, framed in black, hang on walls painted in two shades of yellow, mustard and straw. Votive candles on crisp white tablecloths lend a note of refinement.

South's oversized menu sets forth a cornucopia of varied offerings under the headings of appetizers, salads, grill, vegetarian, sauté and side dishes. (There is also a separate children's section.) Among the appetizers, the corned ribs ($6.95) proved unusual and delicious. The exquisitely tender and flavorful corned beef fell off of its long rib bones at the touch of a fork. South's chef, Jerome Watkins (a veteran of The Ritz, McCormick & Schmick's and Excelsior) explained that this tender yet juicy texture was achieved by braising followed by deep-frying the ribs. Served with a heady Dijon mustard sauce, this dish has become a favorite on South's menu. The sautéed crab cake with pickled mango and crab strudel ($9.95) featured a light mixture of crabmeat and herbs with very little filler, while the "strudel" resembled a spring roll, with crisp, delicate pastry wrapped around an intriguing blend of crab and mango. Parmesan cannoli stuffed with wild-mushroom salad ($5.95) used a resilient pasta that combined the texture of a Middle Eastern wrap with intensely flavorful, sweet-salty Parmesan flavor. The pasta complemented the warm filling of flavorful sautéed mushrooms. Finally, cured salmon and arugula ($7.95) boasted subtle, complex flavor and satiny texture.

For main courses, I focused on the sautés. Caramelized onion and dried-fruit chutney garnished the herb-roasted pork loin ($16.95). Ordered medium rare, the two substantial slices of lean pork arrived on the uncooked side of rare, a problem that the kitchen remedied by quickly searing both sides of each slice after I called it to the waiter's attention. Besides the toothsome chutney, with nuggets of roasted chestnuts as a surprise ingredient, and the sweet, robust caramelized onions, the accompaniments included tender, pleasantly bitter sautéed escarole and roasted beets cut into quarters, giving this dish a variety of tastes and textures that made it very appealing. Sautéed ocean perch with white-wine sauce ($12.95) consisted of two oversized filets of mildly flavored fresh fish, lightly battered and deep fried to a crisp, golden-brown exterior with flaky texture inside. Chef Watkins explained that he first sautéed the perch and then, after dipping it in buttermilk and dredging it in flour, deep fried it—a process that deserves a patent. The roast butternut squash served alongside the perch de ered a mellow, muted sweetness and tery richness. Also listed among the sa was a capellini pasta with roasted ye pepper and saffron pesto sauce with ju prawns ($18). The impeccable texture first-rate flavor of the prawns, savory fl of the peppers and rich, cheese-acce pasta.

The grill options included, as one m

($19.95). When I was growing up, p

South's wine list fills the back of the nu. Bottle prices ranged from $20 to 5, with a marvelous selection in the er price ranges. For example, the varro Correas, an Argentinean Malbec he 2003 vintage ($6 per glass; $20 a tle) matched fruity flavor with decent dity and structure. Even better, the ncott Marlborough pinot noir, also of 2003 vintage ($7 per glass; $22 a bot-, delivered remarkable pinot noir char-er, with a flavor redolent of grapefruit, ellent balance and a fine finish.

Service at South was attentive and fessional on both of my visits. It was dent, however, that somewhere in the rse of my first visit, I was recognized—whom I have no idea, since none of names or faces involved in the restau-t were known to me—and service be-ne inordinately solicitous. I received a t from Chef Watkins, who, after de-bing how he cooked the corned ribs, lained that he met Kaufman while y both worked at Boston's McCormick Schmick's, and that he returned to Boston after a brief exile in New Brunswick, N.J., to undertake this collaborative venture. On my second visit, Kaufman himself came by to talk, telling of his efforts to cultivate a following in South Boston and about his two other restaurant ventures in Southie, a revamped Howard Johnson Café (talk about retro) and Ocean, slated to open soon.

While I was pleased to learn more about the restaurant and the background of both chef and owner, I was dismayed that my cover was blown and my mission somewhat compromised. Still, the level of attention and service conferred on us seemed disparate from the treatment of other patrons only in the gratis glass of champagne served at the beginning of the meal and the wine Kaufman sent over with the main courses—apparently his favorite on the list and one far pricier than I would ever order for myself. While famous restaurant critics like Ruth Reichl, formerly of the New York Times, don disguises in their dining expeditions, I've never felt it necessary to resort to ruses more elaborate than making reservations under assumed names. Obviously, it's time to reconsider.iB

Flammekueche me, you fool!

Cantabrigian cookery

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

For many restaurateurs, 10 successful years in one location would add up to a upremely validating profes-ional achievement. For Ray-nond Ost, chef/owner of San-lrine's in Harvard Square and ndisputed master of the savory lsatian specialty called flam-ekueche, the success is sweet-ned considerably by diners' fa-iliarity with his signature dish: They don't call it pizza any-ore," he says in a satisfied oice. And to celebrate San-rine's first decade, Ost is featur-g the brick oven–baked flat-read topped with fromage lanc, hickory-smoked bacon nd caramelized onions for a spe-al price of $10, including a lass of Schlumberger Pinot lanc. In fact, Ost will be offer-g menu items at $10 or less for months, including a half-zen escargots, onion soup grat-ée and a salad of spinach, esclun and endive with black-uffle vinaigrette.

Raymond Ost, owner of Sandrine's in Harvard Square, celebrates his restaurant's 10th year

Over the last decade, Sandrine's s attracted an increasing num-r of regulars, says Ost, as diners ve become "more adventurous, more ed-ated." Meanwhile, other chefs have been ying attention to the popularity of his mmekueche and his choucroute. "We ve been copied" by some top-tier restau-nts, he says, adding: "I don't mind being pied." Nor does he mind diners' special quests, such as "no potatoes, no carbs, no is, no that, the allergies"—at least not in e dining room. "We smile at the guest d scream in the kitchen," he chuckles.

ECOND COURSE

sewhere in Cambridge, Rendezvous in entral Square is featuring a three-course ix-fixe dinner for $29 on Sundays. In dition to items from the regular menu, ef Deepak Kaul and sous chef Dave nch will offer specials such as house-ade charcuterie; cod simmered with ite wine, potatoes, escarole and olive oil; d lemon-buttermilk pudding with ckleberry sauce. Owner/chef Steve hnson has also arranged for weekend let parking. Pretty impressive signs of civilization, given that just a few months ago, Johnson was dealing with renovations. Evolution, or intelligent design? Both, maybe.

Another sign that Cambridge is becoming a desirable landing spot for top-notch chefs: Tom Berry is the new executive chef at Temple Bar in Porter Square. He's in the process of overhauling the entire menu, incorporating dishes such as Japanese seafood ciopinno with tempura shrimp, scallops, mussels, golden clams, assorted fish and fresh udon noodles in a tomato-seafood broth. You may remember Berry as the opening executive chef at Bambara at the Hotel Marlowe in Cambridge and, before that, as the lead line cook at Blue Ginger when it opened. With his latest move, it would appear Temple is one bar that's being raised. IB

Movies: Too Much Too Soon

It's not easy being a rock star; at least that's what many of them say. To examine the rock-star lifestyle and all its ups and downs, the Harvard Film Archive brings us the Pop Epitaphs Series from Feb. 3-5. The program features a series of films that examine the lives of several pop and rock stars who died young. Dark as the series is, it's worth checking out for films such as Sid and Nancy, which portrays the self-destructive love affair between Sid Vicious of the Sex Pistols and groupie Nancy Spungen. A Skin Too Few: The Days of Nick Drake tells the story of the British singer/songwriter from childhood up to his antidepressant overdose at the age of 26. Lucky Three features live performances and footage of indie-folk/punk singer and songwriter Elliot Smith in his hometown of Portland, Ore., before his suicide in 2003. And Benjamin Smoke tells the story of the lead singer from the Atlanta underground punk-blues group Smoke before he died of AIDS. For a full list of films and times, see the Web site. Harvard Film Archive, 24 Quincy St., Cambridge (617-495-4700). www.harvardfilmarchive.org. —L.P.K.

Music: A Celebration in Song

Most Bostonians would agree that the Berklee College of Music is one of the city's cultural gems. The school has educated quite an array of accomplished musicians, not to mention its impressive history of performances. To celebrate Berklee's ongoing success, the school's 60th Anniversary Concert, hosted by Bill Cosby, takes place at the Wang Center on Jan. 28. Special guests include Paul Simon, Herbie Hancock and Gloria Estefan, as well as alumni Gary Burton and Chiara Civello. Twelve-time Grammy winner Phil Ramone, whose production credits include albums by Ray Charles, Billy Joel, Aretha Franklin, Paul McCartney and B.B. King, is producing the concert. Proceeds from the evening benefit the Berklee Presidential Scholarship Fund, which supports students with four-year, full-tuition scholarships to the school. Wang Theatre, 270 Tremont St., Boston (800-447-7400). www.wangcenter.org. 8 pm. $48-$98. —L.P.K.

FRI.-SUN./FEB. 3-5

Performing Arts: Magic Man

Ah, David Copperfield. For us, the name conjures up images of Charles Dickens' plucky protagonist… wait, no it doesn't. David Copperfield is the world's biggest ar baddest illusionist, and from Feb. 3-5, he'll be performing at Boston's Opera House. The theme of David Copperfield: An Intimate Evening of Grand Illusion is "wish fulfillment," as Copperfield selects members of the audience and blows them away l reuniting them with loved ones, teaching them how to predict lottery numbers an assortment of other ridiculous feats. He's here for just one weekend, so get your tic now. Maybe you'll be lucky enough to see him to perform his greatest trick of all: explaining what in the world he was thinking when he broke up with Claudia Sch The Opera House, 539 Washington St., Boston (617-931-2787). Feb. 3, 6 and 9 pm; Feb. 4, 2, 5 and 8 pm; Feb. 5, 1 and 4 pm. $27.50-$62.80. —R.L.

Chefs Todd English, Jasper White, Lydia Shire, Ming Tsai and Rick Bayless

It's estimated that over the last 20 years, the Spinazzola Foundation has donated more than $3 million to students and organizations throughout the Boston area, but that doesn't mean the folks over at Spinazzola have any plans of slowing down. On Jan. 27, they're back at the Seaport World Trade Center for their biggest fundraiser of the year, the 21st annual Spinazzola Gala Festival of Food & Wine. This year's event offers samplings from more than 125 Boston-area restaurants and 90 wineries from around the world. The gala also features a celebrity-chef cook-off, a silent auction of fine wines and a night's wor of music and dancing. All proceeds benefit the Anthony Spinazzola Foundation named for the Boston Globe's longtime food and wine writer—which supports relief from hunger and homelessness through grants, in addition to funding culinary scholarships. Seaport World Trade Center, 200 Seaport Blvd., Boston (781 344-4413). www.spinazzola.org. Jan. 27, 7:30 pm. $200. —R.L.

Still Looking

Not finding much Comedy in Brooks' latest

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Is it me or is it them? That's the question you have to ask yourself when someone who used to entertain you no longer does the trick.

In this case, the "them" is Albert Brooks. Brooks' initial, 1979–1985 movies (Real Life, Modern Romance and Lost in America), the six-pack of short films he made for 1975's first season of Saturday Night Live and his early-1970s comedy albums are still clever, inventive and just plain funny. His trailer for Real Life, in which he asks audience members to put on their 3D glasses (which, of course, they don't have) while he plays Paddle Ball, is the funniest trailer I've ever seen. And I doubt there would have been a This is Spinal Tap without Brooks paving the way with Real Life, which showed his L.A. comedy buddies how to make a mockumentary. But the movies Brooks has written and directed since that first cluster—Defending Your Life, Mother, The Muse and now Looking for Comedy in the Muslim World—struggle to supply laughs, especially the last two.

Albert Brooks tells jokes to an Indian audience in Looking for Comedy.

Their struggles aren't so much because Brooks has changed his type of comedy. He's still playing the same sort of neurotic characters, self-absorbed to the point of obliviousness. In Looking for Comedy, as in Real Life, he even plays a comedian named Albert Brooks, a particularly insecure and inept version of himself. His career sputtering post–Finding Nemo (he botches an audition for Penny Marshall in the opening scene), the Brooks of Looking for Comedy is contacted by a government committee led by Fred Dalton Thompson (the ex-senator and actor plays himself). In order to foster its understanding of the world, post-Sept. 11, the committee wants a comic to go overseas and write a 500-page report about what makes Muslims laugh. Brooks wasn't the committee's first choice and the government can only manage to send him to India and Pakistan, not the Middle East, but Brooks accepts the mission, images of a government medal and a raft of patriotic publicity in his head.

But even within the premise of Brooks' mission being a comedy of errors, the idea of his spending time in mostly-Hindu India really undercuts that premise (he makes only a brief, secret sojourn into Pakistan after his State Department handlers can't get him a visa to legally enter). Brooks shot his movie in India, but it's fiction. If he couldn't or wouldn't shoot in a mostly-Muslim country, which would have made the premise more effective, he should've shot it in India but set the story in a predominantly Muslim country, even an unnamed, fictional one, as Syriana does for its Middle-Eastern action.

This is what movies do, and why Brooks didn't shows that maybe he won't go the extra mile for his comedy, as he so often used to. It's similar to the feeling given off by Brooks' last movie as writer-director, 1999's The Muse, in which the moviemaker he played aspired to make something as "good" as buddy Rob Reiner's very ordinary The American President. Studying Muslims in India feels halfhearted—it doesn't exactly put you on the edge of your seat.

A lot of the difference between Looking for Comedy and the earlier, better Brooks movies is also in the supporting characters. In those movies, Brooks acted neurotic and selfish, and supporting characters chafed at him for it; in Looking for Comedy, the supporting characters are flimsy and bland. Brooks hires a young Indian woman (Sheetal Sheth) to be his secretary, and despite seeing his misguided research strategies, she keeps telling him he's great. Meanwhile, his State Department handlers include one guy (Jon Tenney) who's as self-absorbed as Brooks and another (John Carroll Lynch) who's a fan of Brooks' comedy.

One of the movie's more frustrating moments comes when this second handler challenges Brooks about his approach to his mission. In what is supposed to be one of the big scenes, Brooks has hired a school auditorium to put on a stand-up comedy show—bombing by making jokes about things the Indian audience has no knowledge of and reviving a bad-ventriloquist routine from his early stand-up days. But when the handler tells Brooks the audience never could've gotten the bad-ventriloquist act, since its members have no knowledge of what a good ventriloquist is, the character Brooks just brushes it off.

So, in effect, does the writer-director Brooks. In his earlier movies, Brooks' characters did a lot of amusing soul-searching. They fought internal battles. If Brooks has mellowed as a comedian, he hasn't mellowed about the world, he's mellowed about himself. In Looking for Comedy, the gags are more about his obliviousness than his personality defects. Sometimes that obliviousness can be amusing, as when Brooks and his entourage walk past the Taj Mahal and he doesn't even notice it. But most of the time it's not amusing, as in the subplot in which his mission catches the eyes and ears of both the Indian and Pakistani governments, eventually leading each country to build up forces at their border and causing renewed warfare between the two.

It's all water off the back of Brooks' oblivious hero; unfortunately, Looking for Comedy in the Muslim World doesn't make much of a ripple, either. iB

Ang Lee's "gay cowboy movie" turns out to emotional and less sensational than you m pect. It's a 20-plus-year tale of two young (Heath Ledger, Jake Gyllenhaal) put togeth summer ranching job in 1963, who fall for ea despite saying they're "not queer." From a creative standpoint, remaking a gene gotten movie like this makes more sense than ing King Kong. Good Night, and Good Luck ★★
There's passion dripping from George C 1950s tale—for journalism, for libe moviemaking. smarts by making his first drama since 1989's Crimes and Misdemeanors, with which this ultimately bears some similarity. It also shakes up Allen's predictable routine by being set in London and not having a character who's just an Allen surrogate. The protagonist this time is a tennis instructor (Jonathan Rhys Myers) who falls in with a wealthy family, ultimately marrying into it and becoming a well-paid cog in the family business. But his affair with an American actress (Scarlett Johansson) that he loves more than his wife (Emily Mortimer) threatens his cushy new lifestyle, and he's forced to choose between love and comfort. It's well-acted and generally involving—and punctuated by opera arias that I'm sure have more relevance to those who know what's being played out in them (alas, I'm not one of those people). The trouble is that the wheels turn very slowly in the drama, and Allen, whose comedies are at least short and snappy, drags this out to an unnecessary 125 minutes that actually seem longer. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square and suburbs.)

Mrs. Henderson Presents ★★

Every once in a while, director Stephen Frears (The Grifters, Dirty Pretty Things) lays a generic egg. He's done it here with a based-on-truth period piece about the title character (Judi Dench), a bored, filthy rich, late-1930s widow who, on a whim, buys a closed London theater, hires an equally cantankerous showman (Bob Hoskins) to run it and ends up putting on the first nude revue in England. Although it sounds racy and its pulchritude is scenic at times, it's more in line with quaint English comedies like 2003's Calendar Girls than with Showgirls. In other words, it's all very tasteful and the comedy usually verges on the cute. The story is never actually bad, it's just never very interesting—the characters are one-dimensional and because they never deepen, everything remains shallow, especially the repeated bickering between Mrs. H and her theater manager. (At Kendall Square.)

Munich ★★★

In Saving Private Ryan, Steven Spielberg opened with a horrific battle sequence, then spent the rest of the movie trying to convince you the ideals of World War II justified all that carnage. His latest takes a more somber approach to the effects of violence, especially on those who inflict it. Eric Bana stars as an Israeli soldier who, following the kidnapping and murder of the Israeli Olympic team at the 1972 summer games in Munich, is recruited to head a covert squad designed to find and assassinate the Palestinians who planned the Olympic Village attack. The early action feels odd, as it has you rooting for the team (also including characters played by Daniel Craig and Ciaran Hinds) to kill people—it's especially odd since the action withholds most of the Olympic violence until later flashbacks. Still, the movie functions as a well-oiled, globetrotting thriller full of nail-biting sequences, and the movie's sense of right and wrong, good and bad, isn't as fixed as it initially seems. As the squad leader gets deeper into the shadow world in which any ally might be an enemy, and in which helpful friends might have hidden agendas that aren't very friendly, he begins to question the value of fighting violence with violence. Does his violence just create more enemies? Does it really make him safer from attack? Whether this is meant as a commentary on the current "war on terror" is debatable, but it's certainly food for thought. Aside from one very dubious piece of editing—in which Spielberg intercuts the final flashback of Olympic tragedy with a sex scene—this is solid, thoughtful stuff from Spielberg, a step up from last summer's War of the Worlds. The New World ★★

There is effective cinematic storytelling, and there is ineffective cinematic storytelling. A love story in which the two lovers talk ceaselessly in voice-overs, but very little in dialogue to each other—as happens in Terrence Malick's latest—falls with a splat into the ineffective category. Like Malick's The Thin Red Line, this early-17th-century tale of the settlement of Jamestown, has such a languorous pace that the action never quite gets involving. It's semi-interesting to have a more adult telling of the same story Disney polished up in Pocahontas, between Captain John Smith (Colin Farrell) and his teen native love, Pocahontas (Q'orianka Kilcher), but because of the movie's (and the lovers') communication gap, Malick never gets across what bonds the two lead characters besides their hot bods. So instead of a dreamy, passionate tale of European culture colliding with Native American culture, this often seems more like a really long, slow Abercrombie & Fitch ad, and I'm not buying. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Producers ★★½

The 1968 original of Mel Brooks' tale of two producers who hope to make a mint off of a Broadway flop—by overfinancing the short-lived show and running off with the extra money—has more laughs than this, despite being 45 minutes shorter. And with its musical-within-a-movie, the original already had three memorable songs in it. So this movie version of the 2001 stage musical, with Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick reprising their theater roles, is a case of more being less. Typically, Lane and Broderick mostly just imitate, respectively, Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder from the 1968 version. Lane fares better than Broderick, but in roles expanded from the original Gary Beach (as the tacky director the producers hire) and Roger Bart (as his catty assistant) steal the movie. Occasionally a song will break through, like Lane's "Betrayed," and Uma Thurman and Will Ferrell are fine as new additions to the cast, but this still pales next to the original. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

A Skin Too Few: The Days of Nick Drake ★★★½

As far as I know, this is the first local showing of Dutch director Jeroen Berkvens' 1999 documentary about Nick Drake, the English singer-songwriter whose intimate, melancholy albums from the late 1960s and early 1970s flew in the face of the excess and bombast so prevalent in British pop-rock then. The albums had made little impact when Drake died from an overdose of anti-depressants in 1974, but his music has become better-known in the past decade, thanks to the inclusion of his melancholy songs in such movies as Garden State, The Royal Tenenbaums and The Good Girl. You have to "lean in" to experience Drake's quiet songs, and his legacy retains some of that cloaked intimacy. Not only is there no film footage of him as an adult, but Drake even scrapped his lone tour midway through, so few ever saw him perform live. Without any footage of Drake, Berkvens interviews the men who produced, arranged and engineered his albums, as well as Drake's actress sister Gabrielle and his parents, charting depression-prone Nick's steady withdrawal as his music failed to connect with the public (the title is a phrase the sister uses to describe her fragile brother). The movie also includes lots of evocative shots of the English countryside set to Drake's songs. There was certainly room for a more factual look at Drake's career in the 48-minute movie, but it's a sad, fascinating look at a sad, fascinating person. (At Harvard Film Archive, Feb. 4).

Syriana ★★★

Traffic writer Stephen Gaghan makes his debut as writer-director in this drama that essentially takes the same approach to the oil business as the earlier movie did to the drug trade—by looking at the intersection of business, politics and crime. There are a wide variety of characters and locations here, and through much of the first hour you pine for a scorecard to keep everyone and everything straight in your head: There's a CIA field agent (George Clooney) popping back and forth between Washington and the Middle East, a Saudi-like emirate full of palace intrigue, two Texas oil companies trying to merge, a D.C. lawyer (Jeffrey Wright) the oil companies hire to fend off the Department of Justice, an expatriate American energy analyst (Matt Damon) who becomes an adviser to the more progressive prince of the emirate (Alexander Siddig), and a Pakistani immigrant (Mazhar Munir) who loses his oil-refinery job in the Persian Gulf because of all the boardroom machinations. Despite the sheer complexity of the early going, the story comes together very potently in its second half, with a particularly chilling climax. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

An Israeli government agent (Geoffrey Rush, right) recruits a soldier (Eric Bana) in Munich.

Transamerica ★★

It's great to see Felicity Huffman of TV's late, great Sports Night (and now Desperate Housewives) get center stage in a movie, playing the pre-op male transsexual hero(ine) in this road movie. But, despite her convincing performance as a highly-strung, deeply sad man preparing for an imminent sex change, it's clear early on that first-time writer-director Duncan Tucker is going to keep the tale on a merely pleasant, surprisingly bland keel (it's even blander when weighed against the similarly gender-bending Breakfast on Pluto). Huffman's Stanley "Bree" Osbourne discovers he has a teen son he never knew he had, and his shrink (Elizabeth Pena) requires him to go see this new relative (Kevin Zegers) before she'll sign off on the sex change. But all Tucker can concoct for these two is predictable tension as the strangers road-trip from New York to Los Angeles before their inevitable bonding, and sitcom-style hysterics when, after car trouble, the pair reluctantly stops at her estranged parents' house in Phoenix. Most of all, Tucker's movie seems like a pale version of The Station Agent, which was a more vivid, amusing and heartfelt peek at outsider characters. (At Kendall Square.)

Unfaithfully Yours ★★★

Showcase Cinemas' Silver Screen Classics series gets no publicity and isn't really promoted to anyone but senior citizens, but it often brings interesting oldies to suburban big screens (like its last offering, the Gregory Peck and Richard Widmark western Yellow Sky). Next up is writer-director Preston Sturges' wild, witty and very dark 1948 comedy. This tale of an orchestra conductor (Rex Harrison) who fears that his wife (Linda Darnell) is unfaithful, isn't as sharp as Sturges's early-1940s movies (like The Lady Eve), but second-shelf Sturges is better than most others' top work. (Feb. 1 at Showcase Revere; Feb. 2 at Showcase Dedham; and Feb. 7 at Showcase Woburn.)

Walk the Line ★★★

Writer-director James Mangold's Johnny Cash biopic isn't Ray Lite, it's Ray White: rural Southern upbringing, childhood tragedy, musical talent, drugs a-plenty, 1960s meltdown, triumphant comeback on the way to icon status. As Jamie Foxx did in Ray, Joaquin Phoenix gives a strong, galvanizing performance as Cash, in a story that takes him from farmland to Folsom Prison concert and marriage to the woman he long pursued, June Carter (Reese Witherspoon). It's that pursuit that drags out the movie, though. Carter initially repels Cash's advances because they're both married when they first meet, then because he becomes a drugged-up wreck from not being with her. In addition to Cash's desire to please his forever-unimpressed dad (Robert Patrick)—who sees Johnny as inferior to his brother, who died as a kid—this thwarted affair is about the only motivation we're given for our hero. Phoenix gives Cash an earthy charm and Witherspoon makes Carter a smart spitfire. And they both gain points for doing their own vocals. But after a while, you want to say, "We get it! He wants to shack up with her." Despite Cash's fiery comeback with the Folsom Prison concert (and its hit live album), the last third drags because of the monotony of the pursuit, taking some pep out of an otherwise evocative tribute to a musical legend. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Social Butterfly

Musical wanderer Feist finds her sensual inner sound.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Canadian indie-pop chanteuse Leslie Feist has her own thoughtful variation on the old Frank Zappa line, "Talking about music is like dancing about architecture."

"Anything that has real blood beating in it is alive, not pinned to a board like a butterfly that's been captured just to check out how beautiful it is from close up," says the singer-songwriter, who goes by her last name. "Talking about music is like pinning the butterfly to the board."

Feist's album Let It Die was dubbed one of the New York Times' Top 10 of '05.

By résumé alone, Feist is not an easy artist to pin down. In the early '90s, the Calgary native began her career as a teenaged punk singer and blew out her voice on tour. Feist turned to indie-rock, playing guitar with By Divine Right. She helped launch the Toronto collective Broken Social Scene, which has also spawned the bands Metric and Stars, and remains an active member. She lent vocals to Kings of Convenience and Apostles of Hustle, and she sang on the debut of electroclash vixen (and then-roommate) Peaches, then toured with her under the name Bitch Lap-Lap, rapping in Spanish while wearing aerobics spandex and a sock puppet.

"It wasn't anything besides the moment," Feist explains from her apartment in Paris, where she has lived since 2002. "Just the moment and a gig and schlepping things through the snow to get to the gallery space to play the show.

"I lived in a lot of places around the world, and now I realize it was a rare, amazing time," she says of the late '90s and into the new millennium. "There was a lot of energy, and everyone egging each other on. The answer to 'Why?' was 'Why not?'

"It's pretty natural for people to do more than one thing," says Feist, who plays the Paradise Feb. 11. "Think of the executive who goes skydiving or the schoolteacher who is actually into S&M."

Feist's collaborative pedigree certainly didn't prepare listeners for her second solo outing, Let It Die. An enchanting album that's more Peggy Lee than PJ Harvey, it surrounds her sensual, vulnerable vocals with minimalist arrangements that touch on folk, jazz and bossa nova.

"We didn't even have the awareness we were making a record," she says of the disc made with co-producers Renaud Letang and Peaches accomplice Chilly Gonzales, later picked up by a major label and dubbed one of 2005's top 10 CDs in the New York Times. "It was really a process of recording one song at a time, and not having pressure from above.

"All the time when I did solo home demos and four-tracking and lo-fi stuff, it always had leanings toward simplistic melodies and non-complication," Feist says. "My aesthetic has always been that less is more, and whatever is there should be able to defend itself against silence, which is sort of the ideal sound."

With her own tunes still nascent, Feist broke the ice in the studio by recording covers as diverse as Ron Sexsmith's "Secret Heart" and the Bee Gees' disco ditty "Inside and Out." Then she filled out the album with her own sublime numbers, including the heartbreaking title track about a breakup, the airy "Gatekeeper," the Sade-smooth "One Evening" and the lounge-style "Leisure Suite."

In concert, Feist now plays about half songs from the album and half new material. "It's a little less delicate than the record and a lot more guitar-based," she says. "Every song is coming from a different direction." In that spirit, she's making a live album as a bridge to her next studio recording, which she'll begin in late February.

Although she tours with a backing trio that provides organ and trumpet, baritone guitar, and drums, Feist also layers her vocals and guitar using a looping system that she devised when she toured solo and wanted to keep things difficult for herself.

"Most of the time, I make a backup choir—some kind of backup singing and harmonies—and build on top of that, laying a bass line on the guitar, or just chords," she says. "You can't surprise yourself when you're playing a song the same way you've played it a hundred times. This tool really made me able to surprise myself. It's a little slippery, like trying to catch a fish with your hands.

"Kevin [Drew of Broken Social Scene] always says the immortalization happens on albums, and then it's like tending to the graveyard," Feist says. "It's like dusting off the gravestones and trying to raise the dead."

To help with the reanimation, Feist has been known to encourage audience participation such as sing-alongs, dances and even animal noises. "It's different every night," she says. "It depends on the people, the day and what the room is like, and whether the cash register is clinking or not—all these variables. It's like slaloming through your instincts." IB plays the Paradise Rock Club Feb. 11.

Feist

WHAT MAKES A GREAT BARTENDER?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartenders issue.

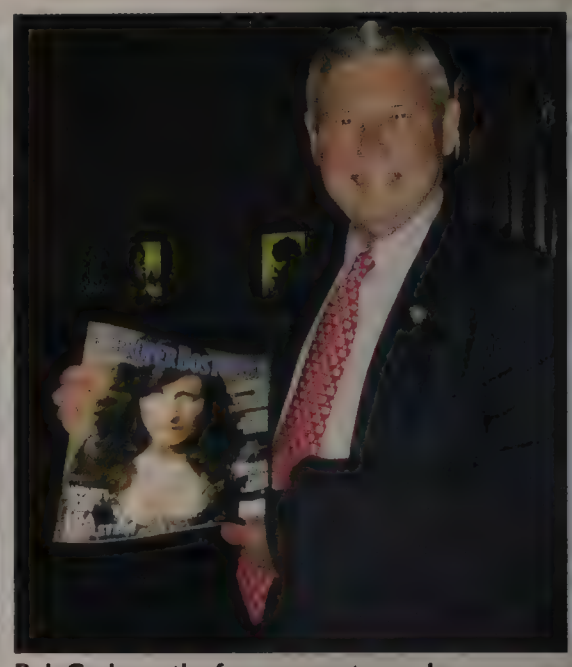
IMPROPER sightings

UNLIKE THE REST OF YOUR FRIENDS, WE WANT TO SEE THE PHOTOS FROM YOUR NEXT TRIP.

Where do you take us? Send us a picture of you or a friend, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed Improper Sightings.

Dack Patriarca, Kathleen Votolatoe and their dog, Cannoli, took this shot in front of a 17'4", 1,656-pound blue marlin, in Key West, Fla. Who knew fish enjoyed cannolis as much as humans do?

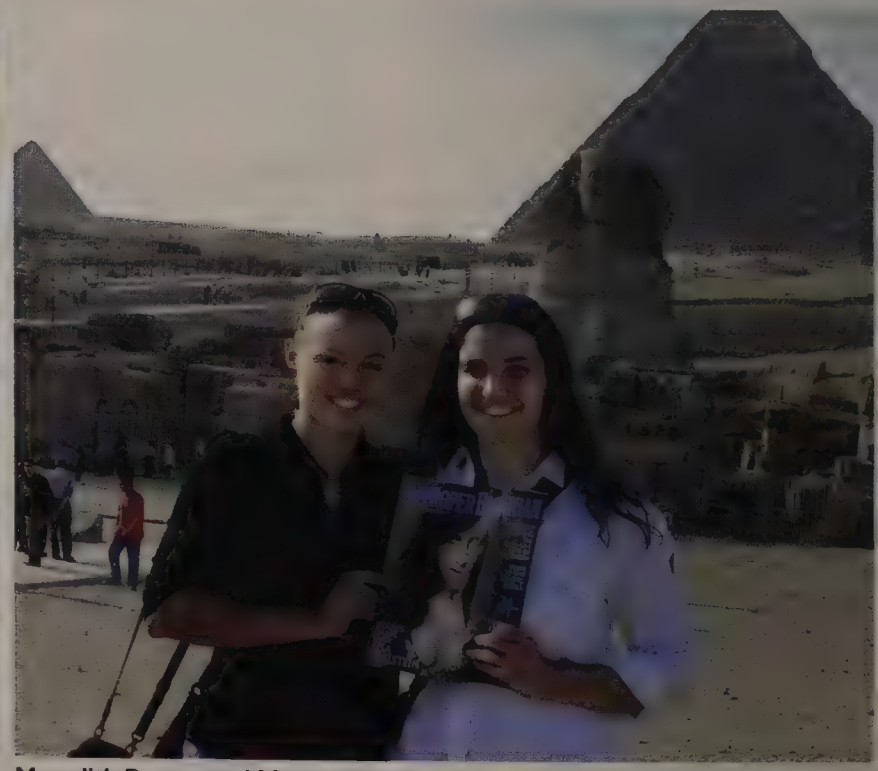
Airmen Tim Robblee and Mike Madden posed in front of Al Mubarak Air Base in Kuwait, where they were holding John Krasinski hostage until this photo was published.



Bob Graham, the former senator and governor of Florida, can now add "former Improper Sightings star" to his ridiculous résumé.

Jean Marc Nelson brought his IMPROPER to Prestice, a small town in the Czech Republic known for its less-than-lifelike petting zoos.

Alex and William Jundanian laughed it up at the Armenian Mechitaristen Monastery in Vienna. Surprisingly, the monks didn't find it that funny.



Meredith Pappas and Margot Kane visited the Sphinx on a recent trip to Egypt, where their attempts to initiate a game of "Got Your Nose" were received with mixed reviews.

IMPROPER BOUNTY

BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER: Waving the checkered flag at the main event of the annual Cockroach Racing World Championships on Jan. 26 in Brisbane, Australia.

Send high-resolution digital photos (at least 500K file size) to sightings@improper.com, or mail professionally printed color photos (min. 3x5) to: Improper Sightings, The Improper Bostonian Magazine, 142 Berkeley St., 3rd floor, Boston, MA 02116. Please include the exact photo location, full names of all people in the photo, your phone number and e-mail address. All photos become the property of THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN MAGAZINE and will not be returned. Ink-jet or laser-printed photos cannot be accepted.

Roxana von Kraus

Dear Friends,

In the spirit of the New Year and the new beginnings, I would like to introduce you to my company and its Journeys of Imagination.

For 10 years, Quo vadis has been the exclusive organizer of the WBUR Citizens of the World Tours. Superbly researched and organized, these tours were meant to educate and inform. The tours presented the world of news to our travelers and showed the world some well-informed, open and inquisitive American minds -- not a small deed in today's state of affairs!

The tradition of excellence continues with Quo vadis. Our destinations are exotic and daring - from Transylvania and Crete to Libya and Bhutan. The groups are small, allowing for flexibility and creativity in the itinerary. We always travel as "friends sharing a good time", never as "bus tourists following an umbrella."

Please join us,

Roxana

rockie horoscope

JANUARY 25 – FEBRUARY 7, 2005 BY ROCKIE GARDINER

AQUARIUS JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

The best or longest-lasting birthday gift could come from generous Jupiter in your career mid-heaven. However, it may take most of the year before you realize just how fabulous it is. Prosperous Jupiter offers artistic Neptune more than one opportunity to expand your sphere of influence in ways that you've yet to imagine. You might get an inkling while perceptive Mercury and the creative sun merge in your sign this week. Voice your opinion, follow your intuition, but keep your doubts to yourself.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Read for Aquarius. It's your Neptune ruler (and by association, you) getting a chance, or more like three chances, to grab for the goodies that wealthy and wise Jupiter is offering this year. There's bound to be effort involved, but it's more along the lines of stretching your imagination than any significant physical exertion—unless carrying a pile of reference books is your idea of working out. Romance will be problematic and not particularly plentiful, while restrictive-Saturn has to contend with Aquarian reforms.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Both beautiful people and brainy ones make themselves available this week as romantic Venus rewards your Mars ruler while Mercury and the inventive Aquarius sun-beam fresh ideas your way. Although you may recently have been in a similarly advantageous position, it probably came with restrictions or distractions—e.g., the holidays that had to be dealt with before you could set your agenda for the new year in motion. But if Venus' many attractions don't get in the way of work, you could see progress before the month ends.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

It's not a slam dunk, but while your sensual Venus ruler and the passionate Mars in your sign are locked in a no-nonsense earth trine, there could be a lot more loving to your love life. Meanwhile, the magnetic appeal of this relationship might get stiff competition from the conflict between spiritual Neptune and expansive Jupiter. A partner or a parent may be facing a crisis of faith or, more likely, feel they're being martyred. Even if you want to come to the rescue, there isn't much you can do. That moment has passed.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

Not all Twins spend January contemplating their financial future, but for those who do, there's good news. You're likely to gather more information than even your inquiring mind demands when your Mercury ruler and the Aquarius sun merge on the 26th. While Gemini is known for being curious, versatile and well-read, Aquarius is the air sign most attuned to what's coming next. Water-bearer energy will help you envision what needs to be done to prepare for that eureka moment. So during Mercury's transit, try a few more experiments.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Until the new moon on the 29th introduces a new cycle that the Moon Child will ride for the next four weeks, you'll do well to continue on the path that opened up as 2006 began. Just keep in mind that this week partners and peers could come on strong, both to you and each other, because willing Venus and horny Mars are on exceptionally friendly terms. The sexual attraction might not last very long; however, it's likely to reappear at the end of March when Venus and Mars again form a rewarding trine. Oh, the ethics of it all!

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Every winter, while your sun ruler visits Aquarius and opposes your natal Leo planets, you could be subjected to a crisis of confidence or a fit of depression aggravated by a lack of sunlight. But now that Saturn, the sternest of taskmasters, lends its stamina to your sign, you needn't sacrifice any of the pussy cat's nine lives. This week you may even be willing to learn the karmic lesson Saturn needs to teach and get it over with. Allies and antagonists carry more weight while the sun and vocal Mercury congregate in your house of significant others.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

Your interests, eclectic as they may be, could settle on novelties, pioneers and eccentrics while your Mercury ruler transits independent Aquarius until Feb. 8. And when Mercury meets the sun in your house of creativity on the 26th, you may get the one truly brilliant idea that'll change your life for good. However, an opposition from pragmatic, productive Saturn the next day should keep future plans within the realm of reality. A bit of a downer, maybe, but an effective antidote to the intellectual spin you'll be in.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

The current state of your household, along with childhood memories, can account for the feelings that erupt, the realizations that emerge this week. Eventually they'll have positive results, but you shouldn't dwell on them while your amiable Venus ruler and adventurous Mars are in a compatible and rewarding trine relationship. No matter who calls the truce, make sure you use this interval to achieve the results you desire, be it a new rug for the living room or a languorous and luxurious love-making session.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Two separate but equally seductive currents may suck you in (and take you further out than you expected). First there's the chance to take part in an intense romantic encounter. The supportive relationship between your sexy Mars co-ruler and magnetic Venus is always tempting and somewhat familiar; you've been there before. However, the first of three challenging squares between growth-oriented Jupiter in your sign and visionary Neptune in Aquarius may finally present the life-changing occasion you've been dying to encounter.

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Read for Scorpio. Few things inspire an Archer to aim higher than contact between your enthusiastic Jupiter ruler and idealistic, artistic Neptune. So while they are engaged in a provocative square aspect—off and on until September—you'll have opportunities to discover just how far faith and artistry can take you, while dealing with the discrepancy between the airbrushed image and the down and dirty actuality. Meanwhile, planetary activity in progressive Aquarius could awaken an interest (financial?) in recent scientific advances.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

Your chances of having a relatively uncomplicated love affair haven't been this good in a long time; so, if you're able and willing, don't waste precious time weighing the pros and cons. It'll be many years until receptive Venus in your sign forms as rewarding a relationship with sexy Mars in your Taurus house of romance and recreation. But if you already have a partner—in life, business, even tennis—expect to be bombarded with cogent arguments when your Saturn ruler is opposed by very vocal Mercury and the Aquarius sun.

If everyone kept their feelings bottled up like warm beer, we'd soon have antisocial behavior exploding all over the place and ruining the upholstery. So send us your letters of love and spleen, and we'll print them for the world to see (Impersonals may be edited for taste, space and clarity). Heck, it's better than making a fool of yourself in person. And IT'S FREE! Pick up a pen or keyboard (hint: we like the fact that we don't have to type up e-mailed messages) and write to:

IMMORTAL IMPERSONAL

Missin' You

To my fly boy from the Kells: You said things were gonna change with us for the better, having no idea all the craziness that was in store. I know that you're going through a lot right now. I just want you to know that I'm here. No longer leaving for Africa—at least not any time soon. The bottom line is that to me, you are quality. I know I was trippin' for a minute, but I believe your words and I hope once things settle down, we can start what we've started all over. For now, do what you need to do. I'm gonna hold you down! Know that I miss you and can't wait to hear that voice.

—kaya_kells@hotmail.com

Mr. Bus Driver

You: MBTA 101 bus driver, young, attractive. Me: Well, you know who I am; we used to exchange glances once in a while when you'd to take me home at night. I looked forward to the end of my day because I knew I'd get to see you, but just when I worked up the courage to talk to you, you were gone! What happened? Did you change shifts? Did they stick you on another route? Please tell me you didn't leave your job. I'd really like to hitch a ride with you sometime. Hopefully you'll see this and we can connect. If you're interested, drop me a line.

Dress to Impress

To the women attending last Friday's Museum of Fine Arts First Friday singles event: Let's get rid of the dowdy image of Boston women, please! I'm a woman too, and I saw a lot of what I consider to be egregious errors in dress. If you're dressing to appeal to men, here are some basic guidelines:

1) Don't wear turtlenecks and wool neck scarves. (In other words, don't dress as if you're on a ski trip!)

2) Avoid looking like you're at work, with a wool blazer over your turtleneck.

3) For this particular setting, it's actually okay to forgo high heels. It gets so crowded in there that you'll end up standing and/or strolling around, so comfortable footwear is a good idea.

4) What's with all the black attire? Are you at a funeral? I know black makes us look thin and is perennially chic, but it's probably not the best choice for these events.

So what do you wear? I'd say that thin, bright-colored V-neck sweaters and tailored shirts with the top button left open are good choices. Either tailored, well-fitted pants or skirts work this time of year, and boots or flat shoes would be appropriate footwear. As for jewelry, you'll generally only be visible from the waist up due to the crowd, so necklaces and earrings should be attention-grabbing.

Here's to your success!

—Fashion Cop

Cell from Hell

To the loudmouth on the cell phone during the entire trip from Copley to Reservoir: I hope that someday you'll learn about decency. Minor annoyances usually roll right off my back, but after the scene you made on the train tonight, I felt compelled to send a note.

First of all, no one cares one iota about the guy you saw twice in two days. "How big is Boston?" you yelled repeatedly into the phone. Clearly it's too small; otherwise I wouldn't have been forced to sit so close to you on the train.

Second, we're all very proud that you "make a lot more money now" and just spent $200 at J. Crew, which you announced not once, not twice, but three times. $200 at J. Crew buys you two pairs of jeans. Big deal.

And finally, to your poor friend who was clearly embarrassed by your behavior: Do yourself a huge favor and find some new friends.

—Too Close for Comfort

Publish or Perish

"Send us your letters of love and spleen, and we'll print them for the world to see." Yeah, right. A little while ago, I sent a very short (four-sentence) message that wasn't printed. I was trying to get in touch with someone I'd met on the street. I suppose I'll never find her now.

Do you have to belong to some club to get a message printed? Do you have to be registered somewhere? Or are the Impersonals made up? I wouldn't be so mad, but the dumbest messages get published. You print someone's long, rambling rant about a rude customer in a pharmacy. (What happened to "edited for space"?) Then there's that convict looking for a piece of ass...again! ("Wrong place at the wrong time"? That's a good one.) This is the second time I've seen his message in your paper. Then there's the message about a guy seeing his coworker's crap floating in the toilet. Thanks for putting that image in my mind. (So much for "edited for taste.")

The IMPROPER felt these messages were important, yet there was just no room for my very short message. Your paper is useless. It's just a biweekly picture book for adults.

Foodie's

We're convenient, but we're NOT a convenience store!

We have a full fresh produce dept. with a special ORGANIC section. Fresh squeezed juices, cut fruit and salads to-go made daily.

We prepare and cut our meats fresh on premises daily. You receive the service and quality of a traditional butcher shop. We carry game meats, organic and all natural chickens.

Our grocery department has an excellent selection of vegetarian, organic, specialty and imported foods along with a large selection of power bars, protein drinks and vitamins.

...And you can still buy a bar of soap, bologna, potato chips, milk, soda, and all of the everyday essentials at our very competitive prices.

BOOK WORMS

What do Ted Kennedy and John Travolta have in common? They're both children's book authors.

YOU CAN'T LEAVE IT TO SESAME STREET TO HELP A THREE-YEAR-OLD MAKE AN INFORMED DECISION BETWEEN KABBALAH AND SCIENTOLOGY—THAT'S WHAT CELEBRITY CHILDREN'S BOOKS ARE FOR

You've probably seen the fantastic Comcast ad where the kid climbs onto the couch next to his dad and asks him to read a story, and the dad responds by changing the subject to how cool digital video recorders are because you can create your own instant replay during football games. That dad definitely has a point, and I want a DVR so that I no longer have to face decisions like, "Choose to go out and socialize with actual live people in an environment that is not my apartment, or choose to stay home and find out how Jack Bauer is going to recover the nerve gas from the Russian separatists (and will this be the week that Chloe makes a face that can be described with a word other than 'pensive'?)." Jack Bauer wins that contest as easily as if he were fighting 15 terrorists with nothing but his cell phone while defusing a nuke and faking his own death. What was I talking about?

Oh yes, reading. I can understand why the dad in the Comcast ad didn't want to read to his kid, and it actually has nothing to do with the awesomeness of TV. If you rewind your DVR and slow-mo the part where the kid gets on the couch, you can see that the book he's carrying is called Synchy, The Ferret Who Only Has a Solo Career Because of Her Hot Sister, by Ashlee Simpson. You see, children's books, by and large, are now written mostly by celebrities. The list of celebrity children's book authors includes Jamie Lee Curtis, Madonna, Tiki and Ronde Barber, John Travolta and, most recently, Ted Kennedy. These people are qualified to write children's books because, well, umm… Hey, look at me rewind this football game!

Back when I was a lad, children's books were written not by celebrities but by children's book authors. My parents read to me so much that we ran out of books, which left my dad with the task of making up stories to tell us, which is how I came to learn about a possessed, dismembered monkey paw under my bed that caused me to long-jump out of bed every morning until the age of 17. But when we were reading, it was always something entertaining and instructive. Maurice Sendak's Where the Wild Things Are taught me that monsters aren't so scary. Alexander and the Terrible, Horrible, No Good, Very Bad Day by Judith Viorst taught me about a place called Australia. And Bernard Waber's Lovable Lyle from the Lyle the Crocodile series taught me that reptiles can be gay.

Once upon a time, children's books were written by professionals like the Brothers Grimm, who in the early 19th century gave us heartwarming tales like Rumplestiltskin. In case you don't remember the end of that particular story, I just looked it up. In Jacob and Wilhelm's version, when the little man says Rumplestiltskin's name, and thus doesn't have to give him her baby (which he presumably was going to eat), the following happens: "'The devil has told you that! The devil has told you that!' cried the little man, and in his anger he plunged his right foot so deep into the earth that his whole leg went in, and then in rage he pulled at his left leg so hard with both hands that he tore himself in two." A deformed cannibalistic troll becomes so frustrated at losing a fight over a baby that he tears himself in half and dies.

Now that's a children's story.

Today people like Ted Kennedy and Madonna write children's books because they think kids are stupid and it's easy to write books for an audience of limited mental development. True, judging by the number of people who think that Tim LaHaye's Left Behind series is nonfiction, it's almost impossible to overestimate the number of Americans who move their lips while reading and can't be trusted with sharp objects. (Don't bother getting mad at me, Left Behind fans. You'll have the last laugh when you disappear off the earth because you've been called to heaven, while I'm sentenced to stay here and watch Emily's Reasons Why Not for eternity.) However, that audience very rarely includes kids. Kids are smarter than you think, which is why I'm insulted on their behalf that everyone seems to think that it's easy to write a children's book.

While a few of the celebrity children's books are worthy of accolades, such as 50 Cent's Limpy, The Pony Who Got Shot In The Face But Got Rich Anyway, Bitch, and Dennis Miller's Don't Worry, Your Parents Won't Understand These References Either, the vast majority of them are poorly written monuments to the infinite hubris of the rich and famous. You'd think that publishers would have learned from the debacle of the Anna Nicole Smith Speak & Spell, but apparently not.

At least the celebrity lifestyle is relevant to our nation's youngsters. For instance, you can't leave it to Sesame Street to help a three-year-old make an informed decision between Kabbalah and Scientology—that's what celebrity children's books are for. Likewise, it's better to read an informed parable about how to get the top price for your wedding photos than to learn the hard way that the Enquirer is just going to bribe a bodyguard to take spy photos anyway.

The main problem with children's books, though, is that children no longer have the attention span for a traditional story. Say you want to write a story with some type of useful moral message such as, "Be popular and you'll be happy." To communicate that idea, your book will need to talk about how popularity hinges on physical attractiveness and ability at sports, so hopefully you've got that going for you. Then once you're popular, don't associate with the less popular, as they'll only bring you down. If you're not good at sports or good-looking, you may as well get into drugs because school is going to be a nightmare for you anyway, and that'll at least give you some fellow rejects with whom to socialize. Then again, you might be neither good-looking nor athletic, but you might have parents who take long trips and leave you home alone on weekends. That's a one-way ticket to Popularville, too.

That's a lot of information to get across to a toddler, which is why I've written my own series of children's books that are entertaining, informative and, most importantly, three sentences long. Here's a sneak peek at the first volume of my forthcoming Books That Are Short franchise:

Joey the Baby Kangaroo Goes Skydiving

"Joey the Baby Kangaroo flew up in the sky and jumped out of the plane. When he went to pull his ripcord, his parachute didn't deploy because Bruce the Squirrel packed his chute wrong. Luckily Joey landed on some pillows and ran home to read a book."

Let's break this story down. First of all, it teaches kids that they shouldn't have stupid names. Joey the Baby Kangaroo? Joey the Joey? Kids can infer that because of his stupid name, Joey gets regular beatings on the playground and has begun telling people to call him by his middle name, which is Megatron. (Not that I have any personal experience with that scenario.)

Second, squirrels are a bunch of drunks who aren't to be trusted. Remember that.

Third, it's important to include some double-entendres or jokes aimed at the adult reading the book. Heh heh heh… "packed his chute."

Finally, it's also important to have a positive message at the end, which in this case is the fact that Joey didn't die and he's literate despite being a marsupial. So he can read, and thus go buy the entire Books That Are Short series. Now that's a happy ending! Heh heh heh… "happy ending." IB

Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

WHEN THE GODS GAVE THE AZTECS
THE SECRET OF TEQUILA ...

...THIS IS WHAT THEY HAD IN MIND

Sauza

TRES GENERACIONES

PERSEVERANCIA TRADICIÓN 1873

In Mexico, somewhere way back in the mists of time, the Gods decided the Aztecs deserved the key to making tequila. So they duly dispatched a lightening bolt to a ripe agave plant and created 'pulque' for them – a mildly alcoholic, fermented agave drink.

Sadly for the Gods, their generosity was taken at face-value by the easily-pleased ancients, who enjoyed pulque without wondering what else could be created from this promising starting point.

Fast-forward to 1873, when Don Cenobio Sauza started distilling agave juice in Tequila. He named his drink after the town and revolutionized a whole industry with his energy, his new quality standards and his indomitable spirit of innovation.

Finally, the Gods had their man.

To this day, Sauza® continues Don Cenobio's quest to make the world's finest tequila. The result is the divine Sauza® Tres Generaciones® family of Plata, Reposado and Añejo.

What are they like? They're like the tequila of the Gods.

LIVING SINGLE

As much as single folks like to complain about the trials of dating, there are still, as mom says, plenty of fish in the sea. Exhibit A: the 20 people who made the cut for our 2006 bachelors and bachelorettes issue. We're not talking just pretty faces here, but men and women with serious accomplishments, varied interests and full lives.

For some of our past winners, appearing in the issue has changed their lives. One 2005 bachelorette wrote to tell us she got asked out the day the issue hit the streets and ended up engaged. Others are, as one put it, "still very happily single and dating," having survived the initial notoriety, and in some cases, teasing from friends and family.

We owe thanks to all those previous bachelors and bachelorettes, and to the 20 in this issue, for showing us how many good ones are still out there.

RIDING THE JOCKEY

To read Matt Siegel complain about Howard Stern ("Talking on Air," Jan. 11) is a lot like hearing a cover band complain about the original band's material. Having suffered through his show at my office for three years, I'd say that Mr. Siegel would hardly meet his own qualifications for being paid according to one's "intellectual ability." "Matty in the Morning" plays out like a diluted Stern show. I'm surprised he didn't take any shots at Dennis and Callahan.

—PETER RYAN

THE REAL DEAL

That a food critic would suggest Salem Street has been put on the dining map by one restaurant is now a local joke ("Dining," Jan 11). Salem Street is the heart of the North End, and it houses the best Italian restaurants in the city. Save two or three notables, Hanover Street restaurants are largely inauthentic junk food joints. On Salem Street, Eclano, Terramia, Antico Forno, Euno, L'Osteria, Loconte's, and even unassuming Al Dente provide top-notch and authentic Italian cuisine. Eclano is as impressive as the best restaurants in Italy. Off Hanover, Mare, Prezza, Sage, Monica's and Carmen support my conclusion: Fine Italian dining in Boston begins and ends off Hanover. Start at Eclano.

—BRIAN BRANDT

RATTED OUT

There was never a club in Boston called the Rat Cellar ("Word," Jan. 11). The correct name was the Rathskeller, and patrons called it "the Rat." Yes, it was a dark and grungy club, but it was popular and well-loved, and I'm sorry it's gone. Boston was a lot more fun when it was cheaper and a little down at the heels.

Now Celebrating Our 200th Year of Worldwide Scarcity.

In an era obsessed with production both mass and fast, our snail-pace distilling and blending methods are woefully archaic. For seven admittedly stubborn generations we've placed a much higher value on final quality than final quantity.

This is precisely why our rums have earned a rather cult-like following, not to mention numerous awards. It's also why we refuse to shortcut our methods in order to hasten the output. If this means you won't find a bottle of Gosling's on every shelf and bar, so it must be. Anything exceptional is worth a little extra effort. On both of our parts.

NEW IN TOWN

Labor of Love

The warm, hip but completely unpretentious Latin restaurant Orinoco has been open only since Jan. 9, but it's already got an army of devotees. And thanks to chef Carlos Rodriguez's bursting-with-flavor food, the buzz is growing: Witness the line out the door nearly every evening.

Named after a river in Venezuela, Orinoco exudes character and soul, with an open kitchen, bright colors enlivening the cozy, 830-square-foot space, a hodgepodge of flea market chairs and serving plates, and vibrant South American art on the walls. But what really captures the spirit of the place is the wall of black-and-white photographs of Venezuelan friends of the team that labored for more than a year to make Orinoco a reality.

"It's kind of saying, 'It took a village to build Orinoco,'" says owner Andres Branger, who was born in Valencia and moved to Boston in 1979. Branger and his friends have put their hearts and souls into the venture—Branger even sold his condo to raise capital, sleeping on the couch of a friend/Orinoco investor for the past nine months. Peeking through papered windows, South End neighbors have been burning with curiosity since Team Orinoco took over the space in September 2004. Now Branger is rewarding the locals' patience: Since business has been so strong ("We ran out of food the day we opened!"), he's devised a system for neighbors to get around the no-reservation policy: If a local comes in and there's no room, he'll call them at home when a table frees up.

Rodriguez, who's from Caracas, also keeps the locals in mind: To avoid plumping up his regulars, he cut down on heavier ingredients, re-creating traditional Venezuelan dishes with a lighter, "Boston-friendly" approach. Although many of the restaurant's recipes have been passed down from Rodriguez's and Branger's families, the menu is based on those of taguaritas, the rustic eateries that dot the Venezuelan roadside and specialize in arepas: grilled corn-pocket sandwiches stuffed with all sorts of fresh ingredients. "Arepas are the great equalizer back home—absolutely everyone eats these there, whether they're rich or poor," says Branger. Of Orinoco's eight options, the most popular is the reina pepiada ($4.75), jam-packed with juicy shredded chicken, avocado and cilantro. Other varieties incorporate creamy Venezuelan cheese, slow-cooked pork and black beans. You'll get silverware, but Rodriguez chuckles, "Only gringos use the forks."

Also on the menu are empanadas, soups and a selection of hearty entrées like pabellón crillo: shredded beef and sauce with rice and sweet plantains ($13.25). Open for lunch and dinner; Sunday brunch; closed Mondays. 447 Shawmut Ave., Boston (617-369-7075). www.orinocokitchen.com. —EG

Good Vibrations

Carol Queen is one of the owners and resident sexologist of Good Vibrations, the San Francisco–based sexuality boutique that recently opened a branch in Brookline, taking over Grand Opening's former digs at 308 Harvard St.

Improper Bostonian: You business is growing. Does it help that your products literally create their own buzz?

Carol Queen: Indeed it does! And of course it's a huge help that people are interested in the toys, books and educational videos we carry. There's so much sex all around us, but it's still relatively rare to find sex information you can really trust.

IB: What do you say to people who say sex toys are indecent?

CQ: "Welcome to the 21st century, where technology affects every aspect of our lives."

IB: Should men be threatened by vibrators? Don't they just give Maureen Dowd more ideas?

CQ: Ha! Maureen Dowd doesn't need any help from vibrators. Men shouldn't be threatened by vibes. First, this implies that just women are using them, and that's not true. Men have the same kind of nerve endings as women. Second, men should think of vibes as being on their team: If you're with a woman whose pleasure matters to you, toys are great to have around.

IB: What's your biggest seller?

CQ: Several vibrators vie for top seller, though we sell one item more than any other: condoms! But the Hitachi Magic Wand has always been a big seller for us, and the Rabbit Pearl of Sex and the City fame. The tiniest item we sell is the Itty Bitty Vibe, just a couple of inches long. Watch batteries aren't just for watches anymore.

IB: What type of palm depilatory do you recommend?

CQ: If you keep your hand moving, the hair won't grow.

IB: Your manifesto is that sexual pleasure is everyone's birthright. Honestly: Where do you get off?

CQ: I get off everywhere I see others getting more comfortable about and having more fun with sex. Really, I've had plenty of bad sex in my day, and I don't wish it on other people. If there were more good sex in the world, I think the world would be a better place. —Adam Starling

TASTY TIDBITS

Petsi Pies Multiplies... Renée McLeod wasn't planning to expand her Somerville-based Petsi Pies, but when Cosmo and Cathy Cremaldi, owners of Cremaldi's in Cambridge, called to offer her the property, McLeod couldn't resist. Now she'll be opening her second shop, near Porter Square, by March 1. The new Petsi Pies will be roomy enough for a smattering of tables, and in addition to pies and pastries will offer sandwiches, soups, salads and some pasta dishes. At first it'll be open for breakfast and lunch only, but McLeod's looking into acquiring a liquor license and serving Friday-night dinners. 31 Putnam Ave., Cambridge (617-661-7437). www.petsipies.com.

New Take on Tapas... Yoshi Hakomoto, chef/owner of the Thai restaurant Khao Sarn in Brookline, has added a new twist to the small-plate phenomenon that's sweeping the city. On Jan. 25 he opened Sumi Asian BBQ on Brighton Avenue in Allston, with a menu dominated by what he calls "Asian-style tapas." Items are all grilled and served on skewers of either beef, chicken or lamb, as well as veggies. Diners can order sides of noodles and rice, as well as a few non-skewered dishes like Unagi Foie Gras. It's open every day for lunch and dinner. 184 Brighton Ave., Allston (617-254-7010).

DIY Cocktails... Few cocktails elicit more consumer criticism than the Bloody Mary. Oh how we love to whine, hungover and cranky, about the lack of Tabasco, excess of tomato juice or sogginess of celery in this compulsory accompaniment to Sunday brunch. This winter, however, two local restaurants could put an end to our carping. The Tavern on the Water in Charlestown and Scollay Square in Beacon Hill have accessorized their Sunday brunches with Bloody Mary bars where you can mix your own elixir. Brad Dalbeck, who co-owns both spots, says he saw the concept at a couple of places around town, like the East Coast Grill, and was hooked. So if you don't like your blend, you'll have to take your backtalk to the mirror.

Café Conversion... When Claremont Café closed late last year, the South End lost a cozy neighborhood hang. But Bob Guerrero, a former manager of Figs on Beacon Hill, and Jim Contreras, who was head chef at South End staple the Delux, have stepped in to fill the spot with the Columbus Café. It features a full bar and serves both lunch and dinner (plus brunch on the weekends) with a menu that includes everything from seafood and Mexican to Italian and contemporary American. Most notable: entrées priced as low as $11. 535 Columbus Ave., Boston (617-247-9001). —Rich Levine

Better Than Roses

Sure, a store-bought card and a box of chocolates are nice on Valentine's Day, but they won't earn you points for originality. Try these unusual gifts—if you dare.

Love Duet Cakes at Cold Stone Creamery

Boston Billboards

24 Vine St., Everett (617-387-1702).

www.bostonbillboards.com

This Boston-based company gets your V-Day message noticed, posting it on a double-sided billboard truck that drives around Boston. Be forewarned, though, it's pricier than Hallmark: up to $800 for an eight-hour day, and production and installation of the vinyl signs can go as high as $900. A plus: no icky envelope to lick.

Cold Stone Creamery

www.coldstonecreamery.com

Cold Stone offers an alternative to the standard Valentine's sweets with its Love Duet Cakes ($14.99 a pair). Each of the minicakes (measuring four inches in diameter) has one layer of ice cream, one layer of yellow, chocolate or red velvet cake, and toppings of your choice.

rfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

HOME SWEET HOME

Ikea, Ukea, we all kea for Ikea!

I first heard about Ikea eight years ago, in London. A comedian there did a routine about his wife dragging him to Ikea every Sunday when he was tired and hung-over and wanted nothing to do with it. "Oh yes," he said. "Let's go to Ikea. I believe we need more blue spoons." I laughed even though I had no idea what Ikea was, because anything is funny when said sarcastically with a British accent.

When the new Ikea opened in Stoughton, I called a PR guy there to talk about the massive crowds that descended on the store. Why, I asked, would people wait for hours to buy things they could just order online? "The shipping fees," he replied. "When you're buying furniture, it makes sense to go to the store if you can." I went to Ikea.com to find out how much shipping could possibly cost. This led me to Anna, Ikea's well-coifed, Max Headroom–like online assistant who's supposed to answer your questions. But Anna was evasive on the matter of shipping charges. Also, she didn't like it when I tried to hit on her. "Whatchu doing later?" I typed, and she shot back, "I'm very sorry, but I can't really talk about things like that at this time." When you're spending your free time flirting with a cartoon customer service woman, you really need to get out more, so fiancée Heather and I got in the car and headed for the Big Blue Box.

A friend—who I now suspect is a paid viral marketer—told me that Ikea wasn't crazy-crowded anymore, but we made the mistake of going on Martin Luther King Jr. Day. I should've known that thousands of people would want to recognize the civil rights movement by shopping for furniture designed by guys named Fjord.

Parking is the first problem. Newbury Street and Beacon Hill have nothing on Ikea. A good number of people circumvented this issue by parking next door at Costco, but, perhaps intentionally, there's a drainage ditch separating the two stores. So there was a constant stream of Costco refugees crossing the moat, then scurrying up a steep bank and over a guardrail to the promised land. All that was missing were machine-gun nests peppering the approach with mortars and automatic weapons fire to make it look like a scene out of the first half-hour of Saving Private Ryan.

Once inside, you're immediately lost. Most big furniture stores have a fairly open floor plan, but not Ikea. You're routed past the various sections via a one-way corridor, and woe befall anyone who tries to buck the system. Walking the wrong way around Ikea is like trying to get down into the Kenmore T station an hour before a Red Sox game. Everyone gives you dirty looks, as if to say, "Has that guy never been to Ikea before? Look, he just tried to take the floor model Knivsta clamp spotlight, instead of noting its description on his shopping list and picking it up in the self-service area downstairs! Maybe he should go somewhere a little more his speed, like Bernie & Phyl's."

Ikea's displays are set up as vignettes, so you wander into, say, a fully furnished bedroom to discover that it's already full of people who are trying to escape, and you're in the way. There are nooks to explore everywhere; if I were a hobo I would definitely attempt to live in Ikea. You could probably hide in a cabinet or something until the store closed, and then you could come out and curl up on a Mörkedal bed with a Gosa Blinka pillow and a Bibbi Snurr blanket. (The product names are all rather whimsical and fun, with the notable exception of the Angersby coffee table. Whoever named that one must've hit an elk with his Saab on the way to work that day.)

After stumbling around for about an hour, Heather and I decided that we weren't up for this sort of challenge and fled to the parking lot. We'd entered Ikea looking for a cool coffee table, but inside we came to the realization that we effectively use a coffee table not for coffee but dinner. Thus, what we really need isn't the Angersby or the Fröjsta, but one of those cheesy things where the top slides up and out to serve as a dinner table while you stuff your face and watch Inside Edition—the exact kind of table they sell at Bob's Discount Furniture. I might aspire to live in an Ikea world, but the sad fact is I live a Bob's sort of life. iB

THE DANCE

BY JOHN D. SPOONER

On the Road: New York Minutes

Absurd scenes from another city

If you're lucky, you'll have a New York phase of your life. By this I mean that you'll work and play there for a spell and get it out of your system. I believe in scratching itches even if they're little ones, particularly if the scratching doesn't damage others.

One young man I know who had a New York phase offers unconventional advice for getting by in the city. "Join a band," he told me. "Even if you don't really play an instrument, you can be a percussionist or a singer if it's heavy metal. I did it: daytime job in advertising, rehearsals with Heavy Flux, our band, at night. We played the meatpacking district bars—the Continental, Hogs 'n' Heifers, CBGB, Siberia—at decibels through the roof. For St. Patrick's Day I hired a dwarf from a casting agency, dressed him as a leprechaun, and we threw him into the audience periodically as a treat. Do you think we got free food and booze? Belonging to a band raises scrounging to a fine art. And there are always wannabes with loot who'll do all sorts of things if you trade tales of backstage."

My friend Sterling has a darker take. "You must know," he says, "that New York is a hick town, more self-conscious and insecure about itself than even L.A." Sterling has been a New Yorker for almost 40 years: a senior partner in an old Knickerbocker law firm, a member of all the right clubs and a student of history. "Here's an example of the self-consciousness, the phoniness. A lawyer in my office and his wife are caught up in the private-school game for their kids, two-year-old twins. One of the schools they're applying to wanted the prospective students to sit at a table with a therapist. 'We can tell from this session,' the head of admissions says, 'whether the child will be successful in later life.' A different preschool had a composer-in-residence, and another had written on the blackboard for four-year-olds, 'How would you spend a million dollars?' They all play the game, terrified of admitting that the emperor has no clothes."

My friend Alan's favorite New York story goes like this: "We were visiting friends in the city for dinner at a four-star restaurant, where the maitre d' and waiters acted like they were doing us the greatest favor by putting us at a table with chairs. But dinner was delicious and, at my buddy's urging, I gave the maitre d' a 20. 'I'm never gonna see him again,' I told my friend. 'But I am,' he said. 'This guy's got an elephant's memory.'"

Alan continues, "We got back to the hotel and I realized that I'd lost my glasses. I called the restaurant, explained who I was and was told, 'It's Saturday night, señor. No time for this.'

'But I gave you 20 bucks,' I said. Sounds of laughter, noise, fun in the restaurant. Then a click. Building up a head of steam I raced the 10 blocks from my hotel to the restaurant and pushed in against the crowd; it took a while to get to the maitre d'. 'I think I left my glasses on my table,' I said. 'Could I please take a look?' He looked right through me. 'Call tomorrow,' he said. 'I cannot disturb our diners.'

'All I want is to quickly get my glasses.'

'Call tomorrow,' he repeated.

"My call to get the owner only got him to order me from the restaurant.

'Out,' he said, then turned to suck up to new, important arrivals. I started for the door but took a right into the bar, ducked low, ran the length of the bar and hooked into the dining room without the maitre d noticing and went right to my dinner table. Two older couples were settled in. I introduced myself and told them the problem. Everyone looked all over the table for my glasses, then the men went onto the floor to check and triumphantly came up with my specs. I thanked them and headed out the front, wearing my glasses. Passing right by the head asshole, I pointed to my eyes, but with my middle finger. He barely noticed me, dirt beneath his feet, and turned again to kiss the hand of a woman entering with others."

My view of New York as fantasy land is capped by a client's tale of her mother. "My mom considered herself a great, tragic beauty," my client says. "She felt like a sad heroine from F. Scott Fitzgerald. She left a codicil to her will asking to be cremated, her ashes scattered in the fountain in front of the Plaza Hotel, where Fitzgerald had caroused when drunk. After she died, I waited until Christmastime, at night, as she had asked, when the hotel was full of festive lights. The wind was blowing, and when I tried to empty the urn, the goddamn wind blew the ashes all over me, and into the crowds walking past. But, I thought, F. Scott would've gotten a kick out of it. After a few martinis at the Pierre to lighten the mood, I decided, 'Better to think of Mom at the Plaza than some cemetery in East Jesus.'"

THE COLLINS CARD

BY CHRIS COLLINS

MORTALITY STINKS

The Pats didn't make it three in a row, but there's still no "Die" in "Dynasty."

Talk about symmetry. I was sitting at my desk at the television station, watching the snow fall, and watching our New England Patriots fall right with it.

We could blame the referees, who arguably blew two major calls in Denver, but I have two words for anyone tempted to obsess on the officials: Tuck rule.

Tom Brady fumbled the ball and the Patriots' season was supposed to end that snowy night in January 2002, but thanks to a rule that only Bill Belichick understood, the play was ruled an incomplete pass. That "Snow Bowl," Brady's first postseason win, was 10 playoff victories ago. So consecutive playoff win No. 11 didn't happen. Big deal.

A local "accountant" friend of mine, the kind who deals in pointspreads rather than spreadsheets, told me, "The Patriots have been stealing money from me for years. It's about time I got something back." In other words, his clients were always betting on Belichick, Brady & Co. and my pal has been paying the freight.

It's time to move on. For the first time since the inglorious end of the 2002 season, the Patriots looked like the teams they've beaten like a drum in January and February of the past two years. Those teams always made the key mistakes and the Patriots always made the key play.

Adam Vinatieri made the big kicks. Tom Brady made the crucial passes. Willie McGinest made the key sack. Tedy Bruschi forced fumbles. And Mike Vrabel always made something happen. We'd come to take all that for granted. Well, in Denver, it was bizarro-world for the Patriots. All the good things happened to the Broncos.

Rubbing salt in the wound is the fact that the Indianapolis Colts lost, which means the Patriots would've hosted the AFC Championship against the Steelers. And you know they weren't going to lose to the Steelers, at Gillette, in a conference title game.

Which means the Patriots probably would've won the Super Bowl. This could've been the third straight title, and the victory that made the Patriots the greatest franchise in NFL history. They were that close.

Will their swagger return? That's a dumb question, and you don't need Bruschi to tell you it's dumb. As long as Brady and Belichick, the leaders of this dynasty, are around, odds are the Pats will continue to suit up for plenty of games in January.

This franchise has too much pride, not to mention professionals like Bruschi, Vrabel, McGinest and Vinatieri. These guys won't hang their heads in 2006. They'll take what happened personally, which is why I love this team so much.

I will admit, though, I have a big concern for 2006. His name is Corey Dillon.

Two things must happen here. Either he returns to some semblance of his old self, say about 1,400 yards and 10 TDs, or he mustn't return. Dillon has become quite sensitive when the topic of his play or, especially, his age have come up. But something is up with the man. I'm hoping it was injuries to his calf and ankle that slowed him down. I'm hoping the injuries on the offensive line were a factor in his lack of production, too.

But I'm not so sure Dillon's time hasn't come and gone. He's only 31, but NFL running backs age in dog years. The way he hit the holes in the latter half of the season, he looked like he could've used a MedicAlert bracelet and a tall Metamucil shake.

AS LONG AS BRADY AND BELICHICK ARE AROUND, THE PATS WILL SUIT UP FOR PLENTY MORE GAMES IN JANUARY

It didn't help Dillon's cause when Kevin Faulk came into the game. Faulk just seemed to bring speed, excitement and energy to the running game. But I'll trust Belichick on this one. If he feels Dillon has another year left, then bring him back, but honestly I think he's done. Better draft a running back!

We also must note how many season-long injuries the team suffered. From Rodney Harrison to Matt Light to Dan Koppen to Randall Gay—all starters during last year's Super Bowl run—the Pats were decimated. It's amazing they got as far as they did.

I have some advice for my accountant friend: Save your winnings from 2005. I say the Patriots Dynasty will return to glory in 2006 and reach the Super Bowl in Miami.

In fact, who wanted to go to Detroit anyway? IB

STEVE SANTAGATI

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Born and raised in Lowell, dating and relationship expert Steve Santagati attended Emerson College and began his career in the entertainment industry as a model, appearing in print ads for such companies as Gap, J.Crew, Armani and Dewar's, and in more than 70 national and international television commercials. A former Men's Journal editor-at-large, he has more than 20 years of television experience and has worked on Extra and American Journal, while also appearing on Day to Day with Rachel Ray, America's Next Top Model and the Tyra Banks Show. Santagati's first hosting job was on ESPN's Men's Journal in 1996, and he went on to host such programs as ESPN's True Outdoor Adventures, the Travel Channel's Secrets of Travel Survival and Fox's Man vs. Beast. Currently a contributor at Jane magazine, where he writes relationship advice, celebrity interviews and gift guides, he's a regular guest on the Today Show and is working on a book for Crown publishing that's tentatively titled The Bad Boy's Guide To Dating. He splits his time between NYC and Vermont's Northeast Kingdom.

Jonathan Soroff: Writing this book on bad boys, aren't you giving away trade secrets?
SS: I am. The reason I'm coming out of the bad boy closet, as it were, is to say, "You wanna know what we really think, how we really operate? Trust me. I know what I've been getting away with for years." You might've gone to school for a Ph.D. for eight years, but I've been seducing women for over 20.
JS: What's the secret to being a bad boy?
SS: It starts really young. It has a lot to do with being mischievous. And when you're young, the more attention you get from women, the less other guys want to be around you, so it snowballs, and you end up surrounded by no one but women. But the real secret is being able to make a woman feel safe about being naughty.
JS: Your job seems to consist of interviewing the latest hot model from Brazil. How do you get them to say something interesting?
SS: There's always something we can both relate to, whether it's insecurities, food, travel, family, I always try to talk to them on a human level. Y'know, I interviewed Hugh Hefner one time. I don't remember what he does. Anyway, I said to him, "It's all T&A. What about love? And that bothered him, 'cause he knows that, no matter how many girls we're getting, at the end of the day we all want to be loved and to know that someone loves us for ourselves, not because we're rich or good-looking.
JS: Favorite piece of celebrity gossip?

"THE FOUR BIGGEST THINGS WITH GUYS ARE PENIS SIZE, HAIR, HEIGHT, AND THEN CAREER AND MONEY."

SS: That I witnessed? I guess when I was at the Playboy Mansion, and Dennis Quaid was handing out lines to the girls like he was in high school. You'd think a major celebrity wouldn't have to use lousy material like, "Hey, you come here often?"
JS: Worst pick-up line you've heard a guy use?
SS: Any time a guy says something trying to sound all sensitive, like, "I really love your shoes." Oh, c'mon. Guys don't give a shit about shoes. She could be wearing two cardboard boxes on her feet. Another pathetic one is, "Don't I know you?" You know who tried that in front of me? Hugh Grant.
JS: Worst line you ever heard from a woman?
SS: "I never do this." [Laughs.] I love when they say that! It's just classic, and I've heard it so many times.
JS: What do men really want from women?
SS: Sex, initially. "I want to see you naked."
JS: What do women really want?
SS: In real life? Commitment. But in a bedroom situation? They want a guy who's going to make them feel slutty but safe—not like a whore.
JS: I love feeling like a dirty, dirty, dirty whore.
SS: Yeah, that's 'cause you're a guy. Women are very concerned about what other women think of them. That's why they don't dress every day of the year the way they do on Halloween.
JS: What do you look for in a woman?
SS: Sexy. And I don't mean good-looking. I can get a hot girl any day of the week. They're a dime a dozen. Looks attached to a sexy, cool chick? That's the trick.
JS: Biggest mistake men make in approaching women?
SS: They think they have to be clever. They should just walk up and start talking. If it's gonna happen, it's gonna happen.
JS: Biggest mistake women make in dating guys?
SS: Women don't take advantage of men's weaknesses and use them to their advantage. The four biggest things with guys are penis size, hair, height, and then career and money. If women knew how to subtly handle that stuff and keep a guy off balance, they'd do much better.
JS: What about fat women?
SS: Would I go out with one? I've gone out with girls who were big. Absolutely. But they have to be sexy. And a lot of the time, what a heavy women conveys is that she's lazy, which isn't sexy.
JS: What one piece of female body language means "I want you"?
SS: As soon as she plays with her hair.
JS: How about with guys?
SS: When the dry-humping begins. [Laughs.] With guys, if he's available.
JS: Do you have a seduction recipe?
SS: Yes. You get them laughing. Then in the middle of laughter, get them talking about sex. Then go back to laughter. Then compliment the shit outta them.
JS: What makes you such an expert on seducing women?
SS: It's all I've done since I was 12-years old. When I was 10, I got my babysitter to show me her tits in the garage. She was 16. You spend enough time doing it, you learn how women think.
JS: Do you consider yourself a Casanova?
SS: Define "Casanova."
SS: No, I'm not. Players will promise or say anything to get a girl in bed. With bad boys, it's all about adoring women. We want them to come to bed with us because they can't resist, not because of some bullshit we've told them.
JS: Ultimately, isn't it just a numbers game: the more you play, the more you score?
SS: Yes. I call it the shotgun approach. You're going to get rejected. Who cares? Next. Next. After a while, you realize what you like and you don't waste your time on women who you won't like. So for bad boys, it's not so much a numbers game as a type. And that's what you'd go after. And the secret is that if a woman's tough, she's in for it, because we look at that as a challenge. The same way someone's gonna climb Everest, we're going to break the girl.
JS: Advice to men on foreplay?
SS: What's foreplay? [Laughs.] No, my advice is that it starts way before you get to the bedroom. You gotta be seducing them all day. Make them feel beautiful and sexy way before you get to the bedroom.
JS: Is there a formula for age-appropriateness?
SS: Dating-wise, as long as they're legal. From 18 to about 35, if she's hot and in shape, I don't care. Relationship? I think 14-15 years is the biggest difference.
JS: Biggest turn-off?
SS: A bitch. I won't deal with it. Or lazy and boring. I don't care how hot she is. If she's boring, I'm not into it.
JS: Last question: If you had to make out with a guy, would it be me or Anderson Cooper?
SS: The only way I'd ever make out with a guy is if a gun was aimed either at my head or my mother's head. IB

20 BOSTON SINGLES

Meet this year's most eligible.

Despite what the Smug Marrieds would have you believe, and all those annoyingly cloying couples canoodling in connubial bliss, being unspoken for is neither a flaw nor a failure.

In fact, there are countless interesting, accomplished, attractive individuals like yourself who are currently without a ring on their fingers—so many that it was a wonder we could whittle it down to just 20 of Boston's most desirable singles.

In identifying the city's most eligible bachelors and bachelorettes, we've relied on suggestions from readers as well as our own extensive network. Each of our impressive specimens is good-looking, successful and in possession of all those other superficial qualities that define a "great catch," but we've also tried to choose people with some level of community involvement or depth—the type you'd be happy to fix up with your little sister or brother.

Not that any of them necessarily want to be fixed up. In fact, the most appealing singles are the ones who lead full, exciting lives and who might be open to a relationship but don't necessarily need one to thrive. Our list of 20 includes one gay man and one lesbian (reflecting the ratio in the general population). And so we proudly present Boston's Most Eligible Bachelors and Bachelorettes, Class of 2006.

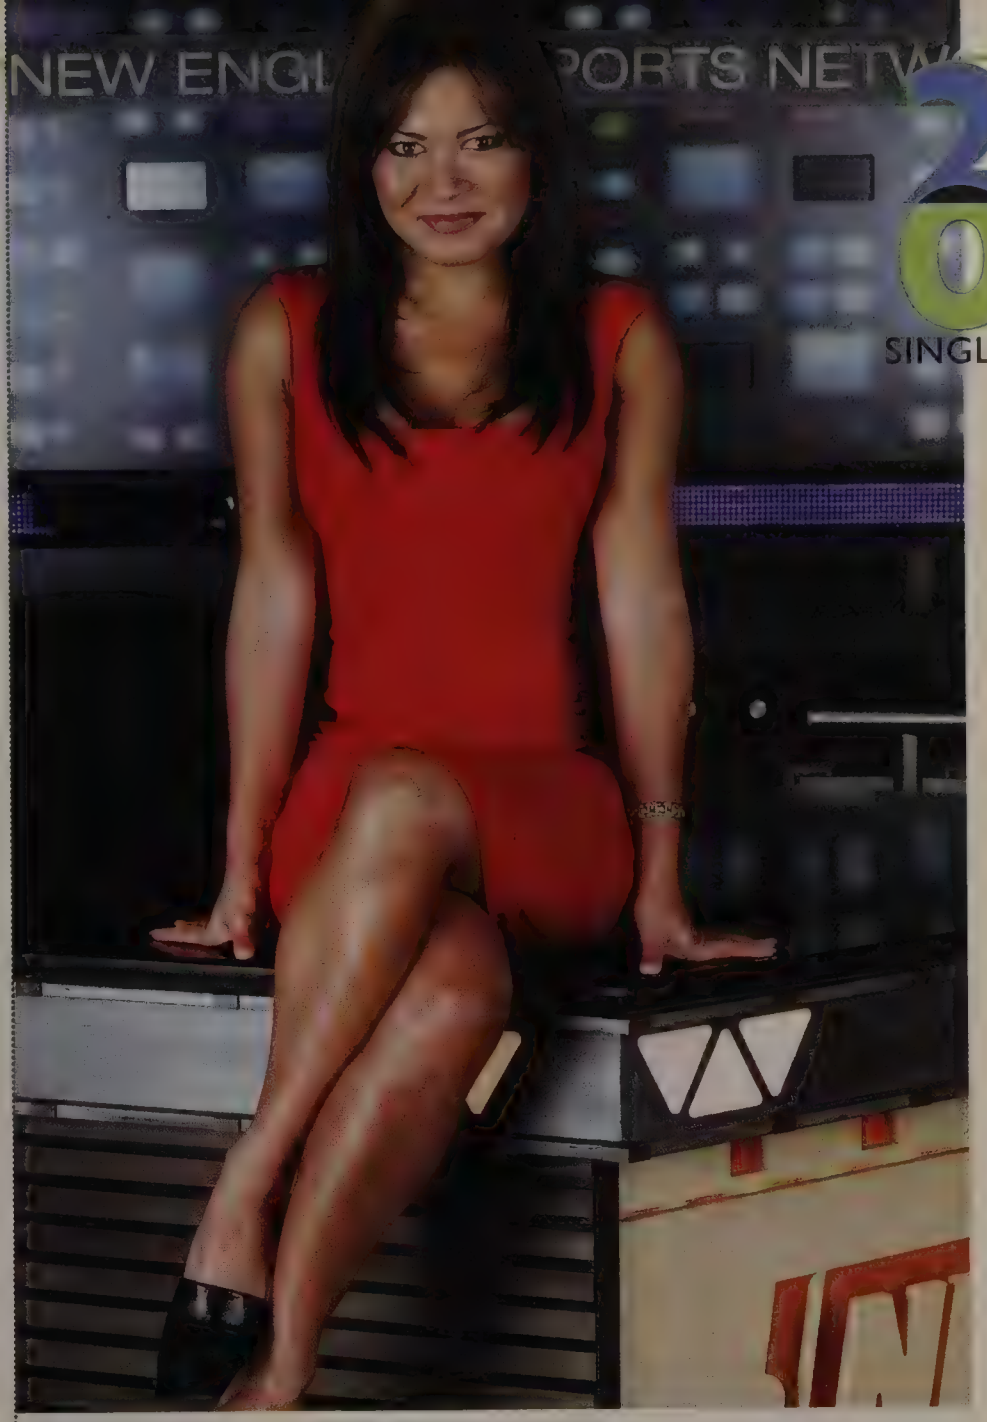
BEN RUBENSTEIN

32, executive vice president of wine for Horizon Beverage Co.

Although he now represents the fourth generation of Rubensteins to work in the liquor company founded by his great-grandfather, this Rubenstein came to the family business on his own terms. Born and raised in Canton, he graduated from Pomfret School and Colorado College (where he received a B.A. in social ecology), then moved to Squaw Valley, Calif., to pursue his passion for skiing. There he met Mike Benziger of Benziger Family Winery, who enticed Rubenstein to spend the summer working as a "cellar rat" in Sonoma for the 1997 crush. Afterward he moved to Telluride, Colo., where he did double duty in the employ of a fleece manufacturer and a wine wholesaler. He returned to the East Coast in 1999 to work at a fine wine shop in Providence, learning the retail end of the trade. Now he's come home to the family business, where he sells everything from Franzia—everyone's favorite wine in a box—to Harlan Estate. Still an avid skier, Rubenstein's taken a shine to golf and belongs to the celebrated Kittansett Golf Club in Marion. Besides spending as much time in the summer as he can on the links, he travels widely for work and pleasure, although it can be hard to tell the difference: Even business trips lead him to such oenophile paradises as California's wine country, Italy and New Zealand. Actively supportive of Habitat for Humanity and the Surf Rider Foundation for the Ocean, Rubenstein has the bone structure of a male model and the fashion sense of Beau Brummel. It goes without saying that any woman who wants him had better be passionate and proficient when it comes to wine and winter sports.



HAZEL MAE

35, anchor for SportsDesk on NESN

Born in the Philippines and raised in Toronto, Mae has always been wild about sports. In high school she competed on the track team (her events were hurdles, relay, high jump and long jump) and played volleyball, basketball, tennis, soccer and Ringette, a women's version of ice hockey. She went on to study communications at the University of Toronto, where she nurtured an interest in sports broadcasting as the host a radio show at neighboring York University. After graduation she interned at sports TV stations, which got her into games for free, while bartending to pay the rent. Her big break came when she landed a gig doing two-minute updates on the Sportsnet network, where an executive noticed her poise and beauty and hired her to do a live sports broadcast on a morning show that aired throughout Canada. She came to NESN in August 2004 on the rationale that there's no better sports town than Boston; and as if in a fairy tale, she fell immediately in love with the city, and it with her. (Of course, the mutual enthusiasm might have been heightened by the World Series and Super Bowl victories that followed fast on her arrival.) During her spare time, she plays tennis and has become addicted to golf, and she enjoys beach volleyball, softball, skating on the Frog Pond and swimming. A sports nut through and through, she loves attending games even on her days off. Limited talent in the kitchen means she eats out often, with a special preference for sushi, and her musical tastes range from Ella Fitzgerald and Frank Sinatra to Top 40, classic rock and R&B. Guilty pleasures include Law & Order: SVU marathons on TNT and MTV's Pimp My Ride. Although she likes to dance, Mae claims to be a homebody who avoids clubs that play music without lyrics, instead preferring low-key hangouts. She kicks ass in Scrabble, enjoys foreign travel (especially to tropical locales) and—lucky for all you regular blokes—says she'd never date a professional athlete. A sports fan's dream come true, Hazel's a total jock who likes to dress up like a girl and looks gorgeous doing it.

AMY SARKIS

33, manager/director of sales for the Back Bay Restaurant Group

his brown-haired beauty grew up in a high-profile family (her father, Charlie, founded the Back Bay Restaurant Group which owns Abe & Louie's, Charlie's and other eateries), so she's unimpressed by glitz and glamour and prefers to maintain a low-key, family-oriented life. Raised in Westwood, in a family of six kids, she graduated from Dana Hall in Wellesley, and then went to Georgetown and studied religion, intending to pursue a doctorate, but she tired of academia. Launching her career, Sarkis followed her first love, fashion, and worked for years in retail at Eye of the Needle and Imagine. She still dresses her brothers, does personal shopping as a favor to friends and family, and admits to being a shopaholic. An aspiring writer, she spends her spare time working on a book, but once she joined the family business, she immediately began kicking ass and taking names. In her first eight months on the job, she took sales from half a million to $2 million. She enjoys the social interaction of the business but is nonplussed by the numerous sports stars, celebrities and big shots with whom she interacts. She treats her job like she's hosting a party in her own home and will do anything for her clients, going so far as to send someone out to fetch an item not on the menu. A phenomenal cook, she's a voracious reader who's also an avid moviegoer. In addition to taking care of herself and working out religiously, she's devoted to her nieces and nephews. On the quirky side, she has a secret fascination with piercings and tattoos and is a big fan of American Chopper, although she doesn't ride a motorcycle. She knits to counter her energetic nature, is perfectly happy on her own and says she doesn't need a man to make her life complete, which is one of the many things that make her so irresistible.

RYAN LATHAM

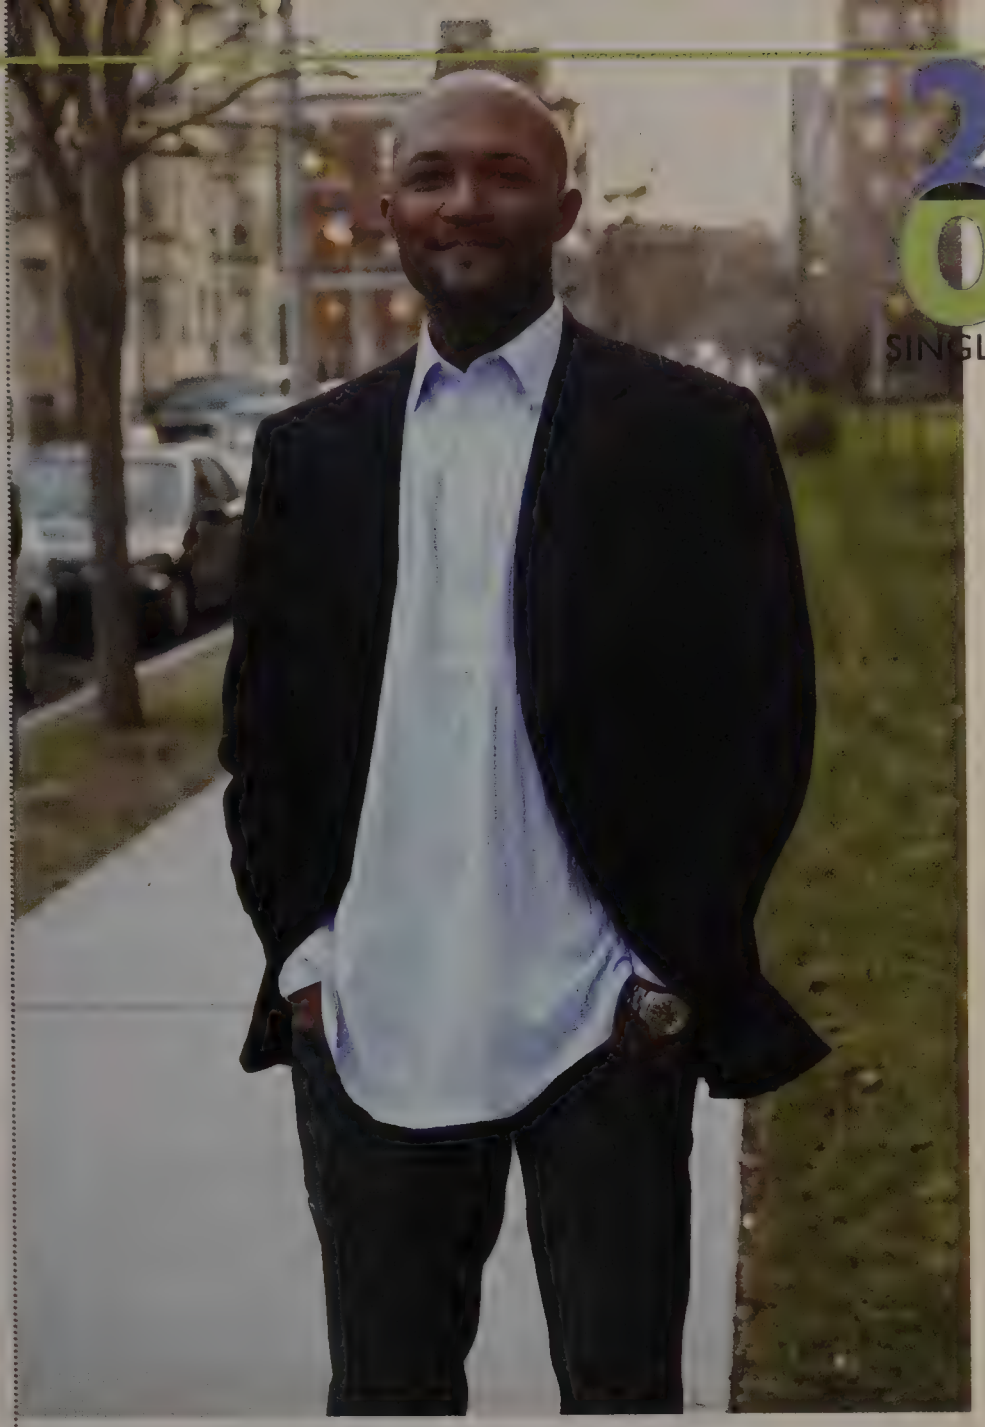
23, wing/forward for the New England Revolution

he supercute Rockwall, Texas, native currently lives on a street in the Lone Star State called Lover's Lane. What more could you ask for? After graduating from Southern Methodist University, where he majored in marketing, he played club soccer with the Texas Longhorns and trained with Newcastle United in England for three weeks. With the Revolution, he made a splash as a rookie after being a second-round draft pick and then came back from an injury this year to play in the MLS Cup Final in Texas in front of his family and childhood friends. In addition to soccer, he loves baseball and basketball, and he runs both for pleasure and to stay in peak condition. Gregarious and outgoing, he's an extrovert who serves as the team's de facto social director—he knows all the best places in town. After the MLS Cup Final in Dallas, Ryan threw a raging celebration at several of the city's hotspots, where he knew everyone and everyone knew him. In addition to making frequent appearances for the team at charity events, he supports breast cancer research, children's charities and inner-city youth soccer programs. Recently, he's developed a passion for fishing, both deep-sea and casting for large-mouth bass on local ponds. Soccer has taken him around the world, from Ecuador and Mexico to Germany, England, Holland and France, but because he travels so much for the game, he enjoys staying home when he can. In summer, he likes to escape to the Cape or the beaches of southeastern Massachusetts and Rhode Island. A car enthusiast, he drives a GMC Yukon but dreams of owning a Range Rover, and while he doesn't claim any great skill in the kitchen, he's a BBQ master who can work a grill like nobody's business. Add to all that his boyish good looks and self-effacing charm, and it's obvious why he's one of Boston's most desirable pro athletes.

ERICA CASHMAN

27, singer/songwriter, real estate

Born and raised in Boston and Hingham, Cashman attended Thayer Academy and Boston College. After graduating, she moved to Los Angeles to design jewelry and then to NYC to work as a buyer at Henri Bendel, but she eventually realized that fashion was not the career path for her. As the daughter of construction mogul Jay Cashman, she had always earned money making real estate acquisitions for her father, but her innate creativity found its outlet in music. Having taught herself to play guitar in college, she began taking lessons and writing songs, eventually hooking up with an all-girl band. Realizing her calling, she began doing open-mike nights, formed her own band and recorded the album Reflections from the Rearview. After networking, learning as much she could about the music industry and writing more songs, she teamed up with a producer and spent six months recording her sophomore effort, Nothing Left to Say. An acrimonious parting with her manager soured her temporarily on the business and she stepped back to focus more on writing and performing, the aspects that drew her to music to begin with. She divides her time between NYC and her family's mansion in Back Bay, and admits to being a champion shopper who dines out constantly. On the flip side, Cashman's also outdoorsy, with a passion for cross-country skiing, hiking, snow-shoeing, fishing and biking, and she has participated in Anthony Shriver's charity bike ride for Best Buddies. A board member of EUVA (Energy Up Voltage Approved), she also volunteers and serves as the nonprofit's treasurer, teaching school kids about nutrition, fitness and empowerment. Summer finds her spending as much time as possible at Strong Island, her family's private retreat off Chatham, but anyone tempted to dismiss her as an indulged rich girl only has to speak with her for 10 minutes to realize she's strong, smart, independent, unpretentious and anything but spoiled.



PERCY R. STITH

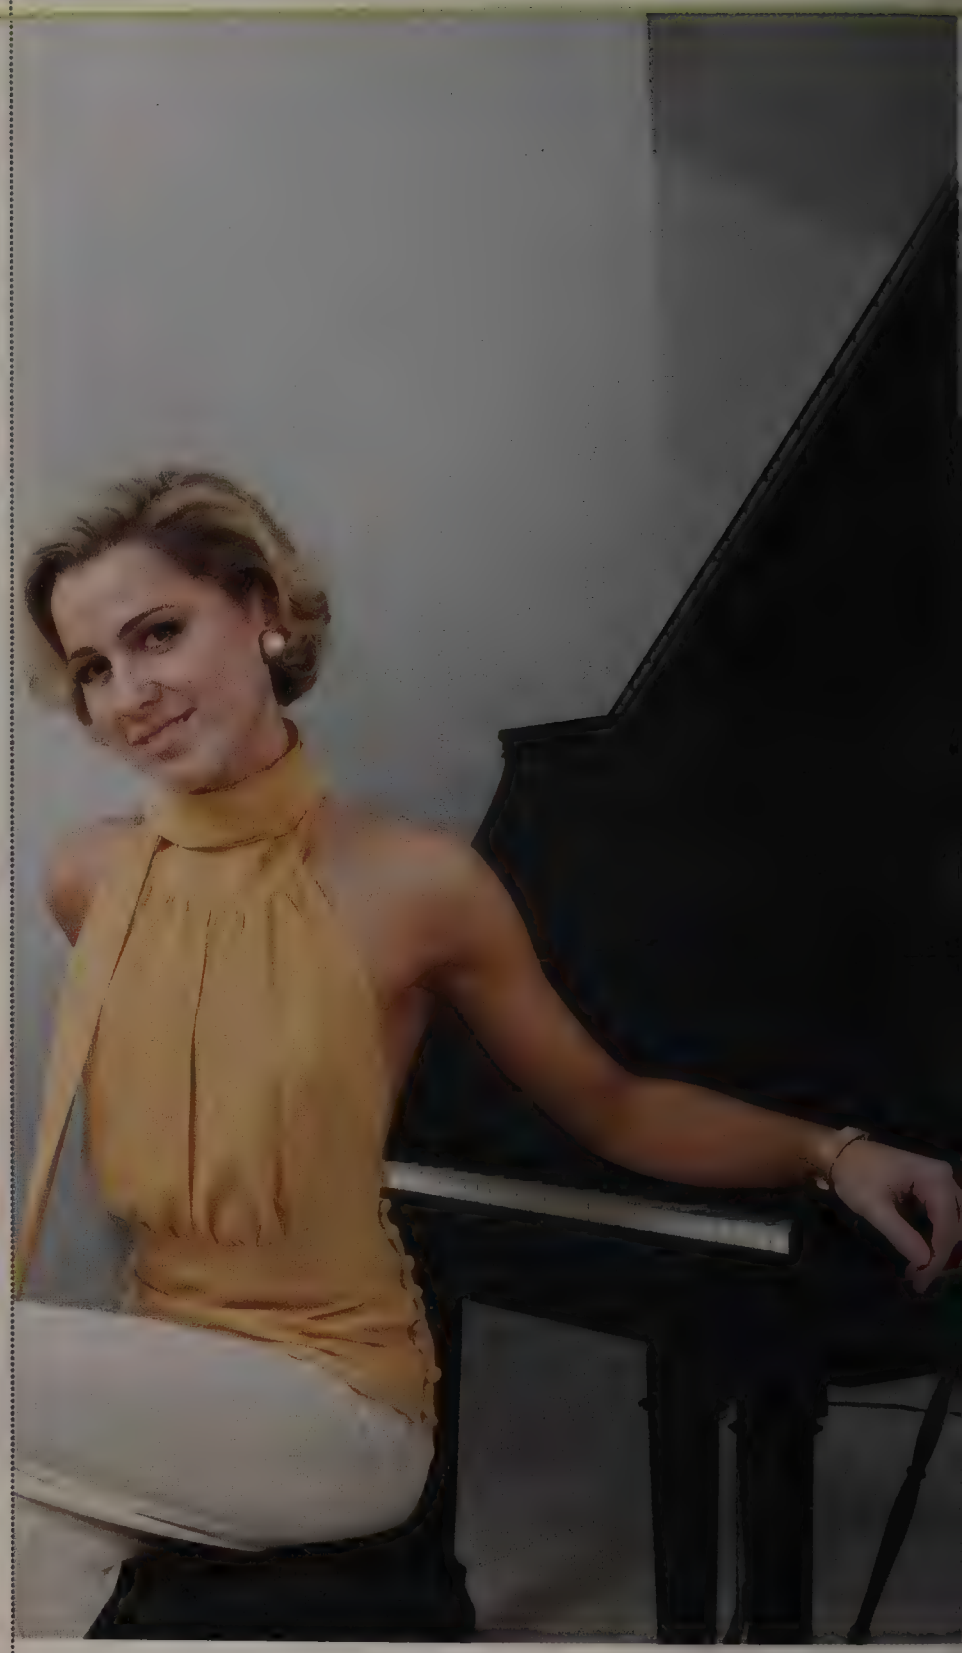
27, founder and president of Balozi, LLC

The son of a prominent Methodist minister father and a mother who's a leading authority on public health, this adorable entrepreneur was raised in Boston and attended local schools until leaving for Burke Mountain Academy in northern Vermont to pursue his dream of becoming a world-class skier. Internationally ranked by the age of 17, Stith was invited to the U.S. Ski Team camps, but a knee injury ended his professional racing career before it truly began. After finishing his freshman year at Bates College, he took a year off to live with his parents during his father's tenure as the U.S. ambassador to Tanzania. He served as his Dad's aide-de-campe and as a member of the American delegation that monitored free elections in Africa. Upon his return to the U.S., Stith enrolled at Morehouse College in Atlanta, where he studied economics. Inspired by family friend and fashion mogul Alexander Julian, he moved to NYC and worked for Sean Jean to learn the mechanics of the fashion industry, and in 2005, he struck out on his own, launching a clothing line that straddles the line between classic and contemporary styles and is inspired by such diverse life experiences as climbing Mt. Kilimanjaro and skiing in New Zealand. Balozi will be available at Drinkwater's in Cambridge this March, and Stith is negotiating with other retailers to carry the brand and finalizing a deal with Four Seasons hotels to make their resortwear. An avid golfer, he also likes to hike, climb, play basketball and surf (a pastime he picked up in Africa), and he even speaks a bit of Swahili. His taste in reading tends toward the serious—history, public policy and education—and he continues his family's legacy of public service by actively supporting the Red Cross and serving on the volunteer council of the Roxbury Preparatory Charter School (where his sister Mimi is director of development). Perhaps most attractive of all (even more than the megawatt smile that would melt any parent's heart) is the fact that he's an outstanding cook, having learned from his gifted maternal grandmother.

JAY SPINALE

43, attorney

Born and raised in Halifax, this affable gadabout graduated from Sacred Heart in Plymouth and then Bates College. With a J.D. from the New England School of Law in hand, Spinale spent 10 years repping professional athletes as a sports lawyer, and with his partner racked up more than 40 pro ball players as clients. He worked for Mets great Al Leiter and Astros catcher Brad Ausmus, and was such an insider that when the Marlins won the World Series in 1997, he was right there in the locker room. Besides working in baseball, he started his own law practice specializing in criminal defense work and civil litigation, as a defender of people who would otherwise have no voice. Always the good-natured guy, Spinale shrugs off lawyer jokes with a smile, proving that being an attorney and being a gentleman are not mutually exclusive. Passionate about international travel, he jets to exotic locales as often as he can: China, Thailand, Costa Rica and Russia count among his more memorable destinations. In an attempt to visit every continent, Spinale's goal for 2006 is either an African safari or Antarctica. A golfer who belongs to Lebaron Hills Country Club in Lakeville and the Harmon Golf Club in Rockland, he also plays basketball and tries not to miss a Patriots or Red Sox game. Summertime finds him on Martha's Vineyard or in Newport, and his love for live music is so serious that he's seen U2, Bruce Springsteen, the White Stripes and David Gray all within the last six months. An accomplished cook with an extensive library of cookbooks, he also loves to try new restaurants and will eat just about anything. For 10 years, he was a member of Midnight Santa, which delivers toys to underprivileged kids on Christmas Eve, and he was appointed a trustee of Massasoit Community College by the governor. Add to all that his magnetic sex appeal, and it's obvious why any woman would be lucky to have him.



ERIKA EBBEL

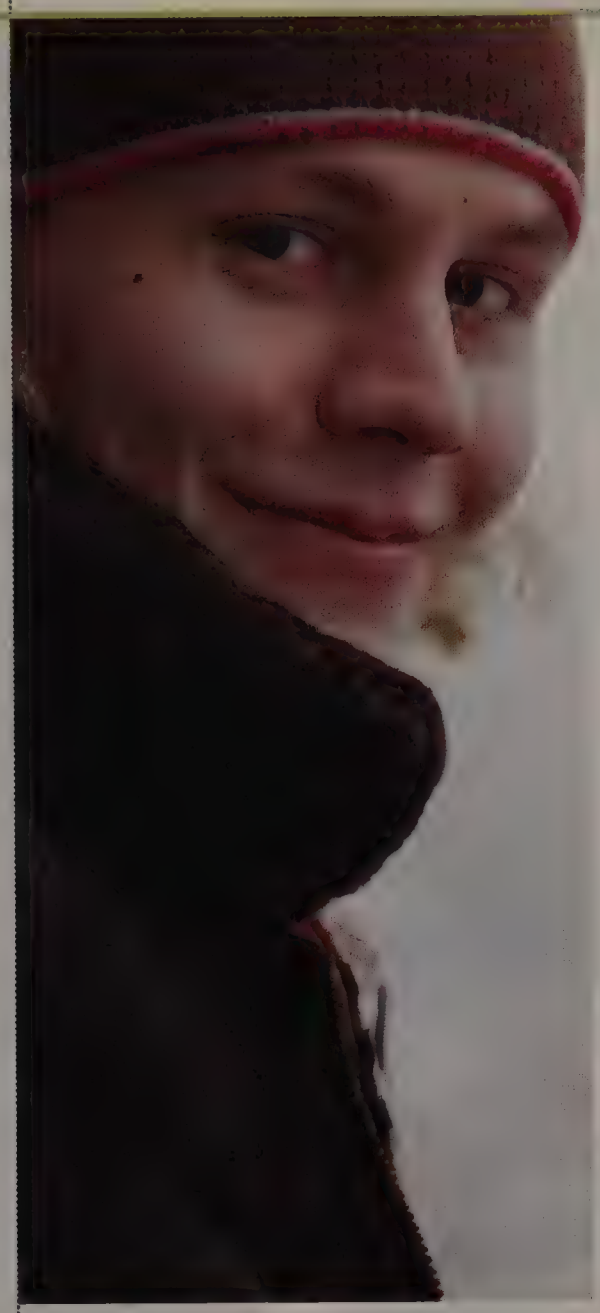
24, former Miss Massachusetts (2004) and current Ph.D. candidate at BU Medical School

The proverbial "total package," Ebbel combines brains and beauty in equal quantities. Born and raised in the San Francisco area, she began doing scientific research at the ripe old age of 11 and studied piano at the San Francisco Conservatory. By the time she graduated from Crystal Springs Uplands High School, she'd isolated a chemical compound that's effective on cold sores, won the California State Science Fair and a Junior Bach competition, and finished fourth in the California State Beethoven Competition. Arriving here to attend MIT, she earned a B.S. in chemistry with a minor in music, and as an undergrad was signed up by a friend for the Miss Massachusetts pageant. She initially went through with it on a whim, but on her third try, she won not only the crown but $25,000 in scholarship money. A member of the MIT ballroom dance team and the pistol team, Ebbel's a crack shot who can cut a rug like Ginger Rogers. In addition, she's a contributing editor at Wellness Options magazine, an advanced open water scuba diver with stress and rescue training, and she's currently working on her pilot's license. As if all that weren't enough, she founded the Whizkids Foundation, which encourages hands-on science for schoolchildren in grades six to 12. At 24, her CV already reads like that of someone twice her age, and we wouldn't be at all surprised to see a Nobel Prize in her not-too-distant future.

RYAN MCCOURT

29, project manager for McCourt Construction

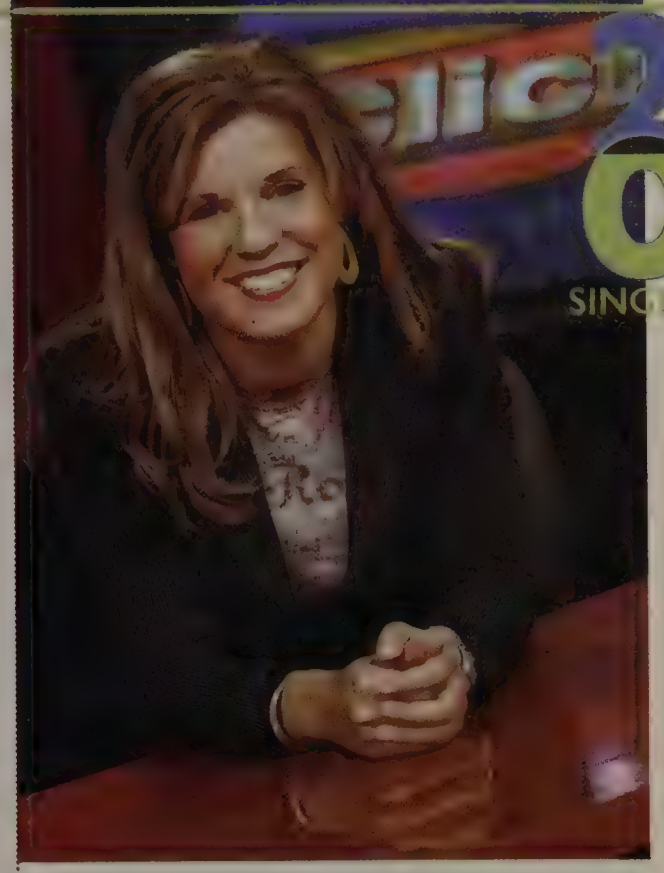
His friends like to point out that when you first meet him, you'd never guess he came from one of New England's most prominent families. (His uncle just bought the L.A. Dodgers and lives across the street from Hugh Hefner in Beverly Hills, while his father runs the construction side of the massive business started by Ryan's great-great-grandfather in 1893.) This unassuming bachelor was born and raised in Hingham and attended St. Mark's prep school before studying finance at BC (he's still contemplating going to grad school for his M.B.A.). He learned the family business the hard way: by digging holes and jack-hammering during vacations from high school and college. Since joining the firm full-time, McCourt's worked his way up from superintendent, having a hand in such major projects as the Central Artery, the Greenway parks, Boston College's newest buildings and the new runway at Logan Airport. An accomplished athlete, he skis and plays basketball and in typically self-effacing style, he claims not to be a good golfer but enjoys the game and belongs to the Granite Links Golf Club (which his family helped build). He also loves tailgating at BC games and watching Sox games from the company's luxury box at Fenway. He serves on the board of directors of the McCourt Foundation, a charitable organization that donates millions of dollars to worthwhile causes. At his family's Cape house (famous among neighbors because his father imports palm trees from Florida every summer), McCourt has an 18-foot whaler that he likes to tool around in, and he recently bought a house in Quincy, maintaining a low profile whenever he ventures into town to check out the club scene. For a kid who might've been born with a silver spoon in his mouth, he's got a great head on his shoulders, and despite a formidable intellect, his head is no bigger than it needs to be.



HANNU TOIVONEN

21, goalie for the Boston Bruins

This hunky Scandinavian hockey star was born and raised in Hattula, Finland (about 60 miles north of Helsinki), and turned pro at the age of 17. After playing professional hockey in his homeland, he came to the states and joined the AHL's Providence Bruins for the '03–'04 season. This year, he moved up to the NHL and has already made a name for himself with his stellar performance. Like most hockey players, he also loves golf and plays as often as possible during his summers in Finland. A car buff who was featured in our issue about pro jocks and their rides, he drives a Porsche Cayenne, and his European fashion sense puts most pro athletes to shame. Good with a grill, he's also a voracious reader whose tastes tend toward thrillers and detective fiction. Toivonen stays in peak physical condition by running, biking, lifting weights and otherwise training hard in the off-season. A regular on the restaurant scene, he knows the latest places to hang but prefers to spend time with family and friends. With typical modesty, he says he hopes to emulate his hockey heroes but likes to think of himself as a regular guy, which might be true if he weren't possessed of superhuman athletic ability. Most amazing of all: He still has all his own teeth.



JAMY POMBO

32, senior news editor for thebostonchannel.com and "The Click" on-air personality for Channel 5

The only person we know who actually gets paid to surf the web during working hours, she's the pretty face behind "The Click," a virtual water cooler with subject matter that ranges from beauty to home improvement to investment advice and everything in between. Her job is to find the coolest Web sites and promote them both on Channel 5's Web site and during its 5:30 pm newscast, and she also does a weekly radio spot on Tuesdays on 92.5 The River, with morning drive time DJ Scott Lucas. Born and raised in Vernon, N.J., she earned a bachelor's degree in communications from BU and briefly worked as a press intern for Ted Kennedy and in the real estate business before joining WCVB 10 years ago. After working as a "script ripper" (assembling and handing scripts to the anchors), she wrote for the eye-opener newscast, a 12–8 am gig that wreaked havoc on her social life. She's also worked in electronic news gathering and wrote for the evening news broadcasts before a company approached the station six years ago to run its Web page. Signing on, she learned the technical aspects on the fly and has since become the hippest thing about the station's newscasts. Pombo's love of the ocean (she's an avid skier and swimmer) engendered a lifelong fascination with mermaids that's resulted in a 65-gallon fish tank in her home. In college, she was the only gentile member of the Hillel broomball team, and three times a year she organizes an all-female hiking expedition to New Hampshire. She admits to being a mediocre cook, which results in a passion for eating out: She estimates that she's tried every new restaurant in Boston. On the quirky side, she has an ironic love for '80s hair bands and is possibly the only flutist who can play Twisted Sister's "I Wanna Rock." She admits that her secret hobby is making scrapbooks, which she uses as a creative outlet and gives to people as gifts, but she insists that it sounds dorkier than it actually is. P.S. Her easygoing, breezy sexiness is as genuine in real life as it is on the air.

KEKU'I LEDWARD

29, director of administration at Pathways to Wellness

ur lesbian bachelorette was born and raised in Kahului, Maui, and attended high school there before coming to Boston College to study communications. After transferring to the University of Hawaii, Ledward realized she missed the East Coast and moved back to Boston four and a half years ago. She's worked ever since at Pathways to Wellness, a nonprofit public health organization committed to providing equal access high-quality holistic care. During high school she did an exchange program in Japan, and after high school she toured with Up With People, traveling throughout North America and parts of Europe. Travel remains a passion, with a tendency toward off-the-beaten-path locales like Costa Rica. Although Ledward's not a surfer, she loves to be near the ocean and to swim, having done synchronized swimming as a kid. She practices yoga as often as her schedule will allow, but her favorite pastime is dancing. At clubs you can't keep her off the dance floor, whether or not she has a partner, and she's a member of the Phat Fly Girls dance troupe, part of Big Moves, the nation's leading producer and training organization for size diverse performers. Ledward's taken a class in flamenco and intends to learn the Brazilian fighting dance capoeira. She also enjoys karaoke (she has her own machine) and performing as a drag king; being on the feminine side in her day-to-day life, she finds it entertaining to impersonate a man at times, and she's performed at Jacques during their monthly TraniWreck night as well as with Mia Anderson's Drag Kings, Sluts & Goddesses. On Sundays in the summer, you'll find her playing kickball in Jamaica Plain, and when she gets together with Hawaiian friends, she plays the ukulele (badly, according to her, although we don't believe it). A true original and a total sweetheart, any Sister of Sappho would be lucky to snag her.

JANNA SCHULTZ

28, corporate relations manager for the Institute of Contemporary Art

rtsy without the fartsy, she doesn't wear all black, exude existential angst or pass harsh aesthetic judgments on everything that enters her vision. Instead, she's an upbeat, extroverted and social creature, with a passion for art, an insatiable curiosity and an infectious joie de vivre. Born and raised in Johnstown, Pa., she was a poli-sci and environmental studies major at Gettysburg College and came to Boston immediately after graduation, transforming herself from a small-town girl into an urban sophisticate. After spending four years raising corporate money for the New England Aquarium, she moved to the ICA three years ago, a perfect fit that complements her modern aesthetic and love of art and architecture, which she also indulges through travel. Schultz's fondness for contemporary music ranges from Radiohead, Wilco and Interpol to Missy Elliot and Jay-Z. Gregarious by nature, she's an inveterate party-hopper, and she loves going to museums, galleries and openings. She also dabbles in painting, although she says you won't see her work hanging in a museum or gallery anytime soon. At home she's usually parked in front of her flat-screen TV or playing her favorite Japanese animation game on her Playstation. Out on the town, she's comfortable having a beer at Bukowksi's or martinis at Mistral. Drily witty, she's got a kooky side to balance out the sophisticated, ambitious one. In short, she's like Holly Golightly without all the baggage.

JARED BOWEN

29, reporter for Greater Boston with Emily Rooney

Beneath the boyish good looks and unassuming demeanor is a seasoned journalist with a rapier wit and a wealth of experience that ranges from producing interviews with Julia Child (in her kitchen), Joe Moakley (at the federal courthouse named for him) and Kathleen Turner; to attending trapeze school and skydiving; to lasting 33 seconds on a mechanical bull; to getting food poisoning at the Republican National Convention and being sick in the background of Anderson Cooper's live shot. He's even had dinner with (and stood up to) his boss' famous father, 60 Minutes' curmudgeonly Andy Rooney. Always on top of what's going on around town, from art exhibitions to the latest restaurants, Bowen's frequently spotted at high-profile charitable and social events. After being raised in Upton and graduating from Emerson with a degree in broadcast journalism, he did a fellowship at Dateline NBC, working with a producer there to learn the ropes, and then came to WGBH in 1998. Starting as a production assistant doing research, he was a field producer within a year and began doing occasional on-air pieces that were so popular he's now a permanent presence on the show. Although he's never won (yet), he's been nominated for numerous Emmys. He's well-versed in everything from politics to the arts, loves to travel (having visited such far-flung locales as Jordan's ancient city of Petra), and stays in fighting shape by running five to seven miles every day. This movie buff is also civically minded, having volunteered at Newton-Wellesley Hospital, the Perkins School for the Blind and the Greater Boston Food Bank (organizing five of his fellow Greater Boston staffers to join him). Accomplished without being arrogant and interesting without being a braggart, he's the kind of guy who's full of surprises at the same time as being utterly down-to-earth.

TACHOU DUBUISSON

32, owner of Tachou

Beverly native of Haitian descent, she graduated from Beverly High and received a full academic scholarship to Colby College, where she also captained the track and field team—easy to imagine, given her tall, lean physique. After several years in finance and banking, including a stint as an analyst for EDS (the company of former presidential hopeful Ross Perot), she decided to play to her outgoing personality and started an eponymous special events–planning company, which became an immediate success. After only six months in business she had mounted the after-party for Comics Come Home, a luncheon for Johnny Damon, Verizon Wireless' employee appreciation day and events for Coca Cola. At age 27 she launched a second career as a fashion model, doing print and runway work for such clients as Chanel, Carolina Herrera and Oscar de la Renta through local modeling giant Maggie, Inc. But this go-getter isn't just an event planner and model: She's a devoted aunt to her new nephew, a voracious reader (the English major in her), a seasoned traveler and an avid kickboxer who's training for the Boston Marathon, just to get it off her to-do list. Proceeds from her run will benefit Read Boston, and she's participated in Walk America for the March of Dimes and organized a Jimmy Fund event at Game On! Statuesque and chic, Dubuisson's a fixture at the city's hottest clubs, restaurants and parties. Just look for the energetic sophisticate who doesn't takes thing too seriously and knows how to have a good time.

KATHY RYAN

46, yoga instructor and choreographer

yan graduated from Wellesley High and studied dance and theater at UMass before landing in NYC, where she studied with such dance companies as Alvin Ailey and eventually signed with the Wilhelmina Modeling Agency. After modeling in NYC, Europe and L.A. for several years, she signed with an agency in L.A. and moved there to work in commercials and pursue an acting career. While in L.A., she was drawn back to dance. As a choreographer, she founded her own dance troupe which performed for such powerhouses as Dick Clark Productions and Disney; she's also choreographed for and performed on numerous TV shows and commercials and choreographed routines for such stars as Sharon Stone and Pamela Anderson. Originally drawn to yoga as a warm-up for her dancers, she became certified to teach and returned to Boston to be near her family, opening her own yoga studio in Wellesley. She now teaches at the Sports Club/L.A. in Boston, Laughing Dog in Wellesley and Bosse Sports in Sudbury, and she offers clinics and workshops at places like Canyon Ranch in Lennox. Her celebrity pupils have ranged from Caterina Bandini and Ming Tsai to Chris Knight (a.k.a. Peter Brady). She's an avid outdoorswoman and is crazy about golf. Although Ryan spends as much time as possible at her family's house in Falmouth, she also attends the theater whenever she can, loves live music and reads everything from self-help books to bestselling novels. Her charitable efforts have included volunteering for Project Angelfood, as well as choreographing the Jerry Lewis Muscular Dystrophy Telethon. This stunning blonde with a million-watt smile dedicates her life to finding the joy in the everyday, and it shows in the fun she brings to her yoga classes.

JOE MACDONALD

41, associate professor of architecture at Harvard's Graduate School of Design and principal in Urban A&O Architecture and Design ur strikingly handsome, red-headed, gay bachelor was born and raised on a cattle ranch in Alberta, Canada, and attended boarding school on Vancouver Island before choosing to study architecture at the University of Washington, where he was captain of the crew team. He began his postgraduate studies at London's prestigious Architecture Association before completing his degree at Harvard in 1992. After working for several prominent firms, he was offered a teaching job at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, N.Y., and then joined the faculty at Harvard in 2000, having established his own practice in Cambridge and NYC in 1997 (his specialty is residential architecture, exhibitions and product design). In addition to rowing, he plays hockey and rugby, skis, boxes and runs, and has traveled to every continent except Antarctica, although that's on his to-do list for spring. A fashion plate who favors such designers as Martin Margiella, Alexander McQueen and Costume National, he has a dozen pairs of the obligatory architect's specs but prefers to wear contacts. A contemporary art collector, he's specifically interested in the aesthetic sliver of time between 1968 and 1972, and he actively supports emerging artists by either underwriting shows or buying their work. As a muscle-car enthusiast, he worked with the Ford Motor Company on an exhibit for the re-release of the GT40. Philanthropically, he's involved in numerous charities, from the AIDS Action Committee and the Anti-Violence Campaign Fund to such institutions as the ICA, the Museum of Modern Art and the Whitney. An advisor to the Lef Foundation (dedicated to improving urban environments), he's also a member of the Architecture League and a fellow at the Institute for Urban Design, among numerous other honors and accolades. As far as we can tell, his only downside is that he doesn't cook.

LINDSAY CURTIS

24, director of marketing and special events at Game On!

One might expect the daughter of the legendary news team of Chet and Natalie to be some kind of princess, but not a bit of it. You'd be hard-pressed to find a lovelier, more soft-spoken, accommodating and gracious young lady than Lindsay Curtis, who was born and raised in Needham, attended Noble and Greenough and received a bachelor's degree from Vanderbilt University. A competitive horseback rider who won three national championships (the National Prix de States), she still rides in her spare time, although she no longer competes. Going to work for nightlife conglomerate the Lyons Group, she worked at the high-concept bowling alley and lounge King's for a year and a half before becoming director of marketing and events at Game On! Curtis rates herself somewhere between duffer and scratch at golf, playing every weekend when weather permits. Summertime finds her at the family place on Nantucket, where she spends as much time on the water—fishing, boating, beaching, what have you—as possible. She's also an avid sports fan with a penchant for pro baseball and football as well as college football and basketball. Influenced by her parents' involvement (they hosted the telethon on Channel 5 for years), she's active with the Muscular Dystrophy Association as both an events organizer and volunteer. A blue-eyed, blonde beauty, she's lovely to look at and delightful to know.

WILLIAM F. "BILL" MEARA III

28, principal in Meara Media

Smart, funny, successful, kind, considerate and generous, Meara's still got a touch of the devil to him and a rakish charm, along with being as cute as they come. A South Shore native, he graduated from Hingham High and did a post-graduate year at the Canterbury School in Connecticut before earning his bachelor's degree in history from Trinity College. He made a name for himself in real estate after college, and then joined his father and uncle in founding Meara Media, which sells outdoor advertising in NYC, Las Vegas and other cities to media buyers and advertising agencies. With a new joint venture—Vector/Meara Transit Advertising Group—they're well on their way to becoming a giant in the industry. One drawback to his phenomenal success is that it's kept him from returning to school to earn his M.B.A. He loved lacrosse in college and still plays in a local league, competing everywhere from Vail to Lake Placid. Plus, he's a major supporter of Metro Lacrosse, a non-profit that brings the sport to inner-city kids. A former board member of United Leaders, a non-profit dedicated to training future political leaders, he's a member of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Outdoor Advertising Association and the Nantucket Anglers Clubs. As an avid fisherman, he keeps a sport fishing boat in Ft. Lauderdale in the winter and Osterville in the summer, and when he was 12 caught a bull dolphin two pounds off the world record, which is now mounted in the bathroom of his Southie condo. Summer finds him at his family's place in Marston's Mills, and he enjoys golf without being a lunatic about it. In college he did some print modeling that he's too modest to talk about, but he still has a strong individual fashion sense and admits to being a clothes horse who shops everywhere from H&M to Hugo Boss. Perhaps his most telling characteristic, however, is his devotion to his friends, all of whom attest that more than anything, he's just an all-around good guy.

JAY GORDON

34, co-founder of Bodega, LLC

Born and raised in Brookline, Gordon is 6'5" with startling blue eyes and well-chiseled cheekbones. At Dickinson College in Pennsylvania, he hosted an alternative-music show on the college radio station and interned at WBCN on vacations, which explains why music remains one of his passions. Another passion is golf, which he plays (at the level of a pro) at Belmont Country Club. After working in a family plastics business which he and his brother sold, Gordon tried his hand at advertising but recently expanded his horizons by launching a new venture: a concept store called Bodega that will look from the front like your typical Latin neighborhood grocery but will sell cutting-edge fashion and sneakers, in addition to being a boutique ad agency. A talented ceramist, he used to concentrate on Raku (a low-fired glazing process that results in a black base and random patterns) but now throws primarily stoneware. An accomplished squash player, he loves to cross-country ski, kayak and hike, but of late, his new dog, Boomer, has monopolized his time. Well-traveled, he's been to every continent except Antarctica. A former volunteer for the Mass. Association for the Blind, he did a 50-mile walk to fight multiple sclerosis last year and actively supports the Special Olympics. Devoted to his three nieces, he's extremely family-oriented and despite looking like a WASP, he's a nice Jewish boy your Bubbe would plotz over. IB

MOPSY

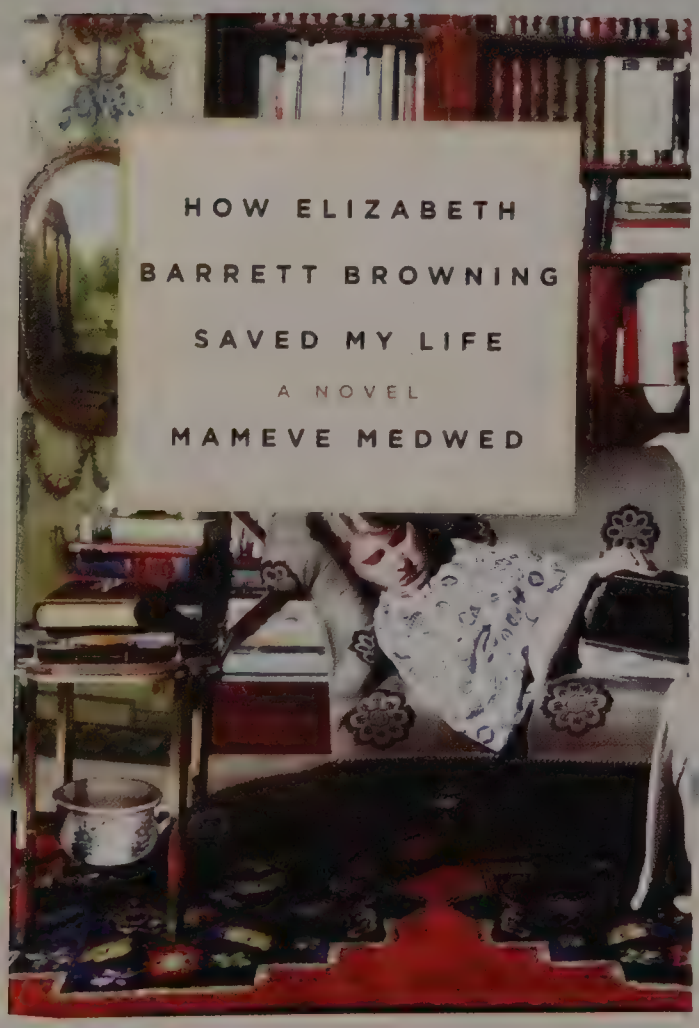
BY MOPSY STRANGE KENNEDY



MAMEVE KEEPS THE CAMBRIDGE TOUCH

Mameve Medwed's latest novel is How Elizabeth Barrett Browning Saved My Life.

How does a young Cambridge woman, slightly tilted away from the professorial harrumphing of her Harvard father, find her way in life, love, friendship and work? Abby Randolph, a Harvard dropout, grows up in a family that's linked to its neighbors via their connected backyards. While the two mothers fall in love and fly away, Abby sustains a crush on that family's son, Ned, and develops a rivalrous friendship with his sister, Lavinia. After the runaway moms die in an earthquake, a chamber pot comes into Abby's possession, and lo, she hits the chamber jackpot on Antiques Roadshow when it's discovered to be Elizabeth Barrett Browning's personal porta potty. Scuffles and kerfuffles abound; Lavinia, now Abby's stepsister of sorts, makes a claim to the precious porcelain, not to mention the scads of cads who complicate the picture: an unscrupulous reporter from the Boston Globe, [illegible] for the story; Ned, who spills secrets in a roman à clef; and a mean ex-boyfriend who goes through a flippant (Sorry! Now I gotta go!) repentance program. Cambridge author Medwed's flowing pace and springy, mischievous spirit keep the story rolling along, saturated on every page with Cambridge people, places and values—like intellectual snobbery and the desire to be liberated from it.

TAKE ONE VINTAGE SOFA AS AN ANTI-DEPRESSANT

An expanded incarnation of Ruby Slippers, formerly in Belmont, is now Teresina's at 4–6 Nason St., Maynard, selling contemporary and vintage clothing and home furnishings. They call their spirit "living out loud." Open Tue.–Sat., 10 am–6 pm. 978-897-3914.

This store is simply bursting with joy—a spirit that emanates from owners Deborah and Wil Ricci, their helpers, who might be acting in a country sitcom, and the smiling shoppers themselves. With a background in design, Deb's fortuitous scroungings turn up such furniture as a 1930s club set—two chairs with large, decisively flat armrests and a sofa reupholstered in toile and plaid with sweet contrasting piping. Nearby are spackled tables, Hoosier cupboards, glass-fronted bookcases and a working 1940s Wedgwood kitchen range. Mostly because the box is pretty, a French detergent named L'Amande is sold, complemented by a deep-blue poster of it displayed in the shop. Another romantic resonance is a Mark Twain house–like drooping green velvet swag. Campiness, magnificence and down-home coziness variously inhabit the furnishings and the vintage, very high-quality clothing. Teresina's offers men and women a selection that might include fine cashmere sweaters, thick and crunchy ethnic jackets with a tapestried look, a mischievously sexy red crocheted skirt with a pink lining, or a dramatic long cape for roaming the Moors that's black on one side and gray on the other. For babies and toddlers, Teresina's fuzzy socks and adorable hand-knit sweaters will keep any precious bundle warm. Its monthly community events bring jazz piano, and Family Nights bring partylike fun.

TUB AND RUB IN ZENMAN SQUARE

Urban Oasis in Inman Square offers chair and full-body massage, hot tubs or combos. It's the inspired brainchild of Renée Farster and Jo Gray, available for parties, couples and after-hour dunks. 243 Hampshire St., Cambridge (617-491-0176).

Urban Oasis is is tucked behind Rosie's Bakery, where the shop's old baking section used to be. Figuratively speaking, you can soothingly bake your own self there in a hot tub. Urban's respites are provided in Inman Square, a place that exudes a friendly village feeling. You can choose a Japanese-style wooden hot tub that's roomy enough for two or three people and inviting enough for contemplation. Or you can opt instead for a big fiberglass one with 56 jets that accommodates up to five soakers. In the community room, another tub serves for a quick, hot dip and can be rented for parties of up to 10. A clothes-on chair massage will make you feel like you're a tablecloth being firmly ironed smooth. Full massages include deep tissue, Swedish, shiatsu and others. Pregnant women get massaged on a comically comfy table with belly-and-breast holes, while couples can each get massaged separately, then plunge together into a hot tub. What better way to soften the harshness of a tense disagreement and reroute it into contentment? While being massaged, you can enjoy the atmosphere: wall sculptures made of bundles of sticks, light filtered through faceted brick-shaped glass windows, big seagrass chairs and the cooings of relaxing music.

ON FIRE!

Chris Douglass' Ashmont Grill is Dorchester's new hot spot.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY TONY SCARPETTA

Mussels with chorizo, tomatoes, white wine and grilled crostini bread

Of all the identifiable geographic areas in Boston, Dorchester is the most amorphous in terms of its boundaries. Considered as one neighborhood, it's the largest in the city, but it has no well-defined center. Peabody Square, where Ashmont Street, Dorchester Avenue, Talbot Avenue and Bushnell Street intersect close to the Ashmont T station, is one of Dorchester's many small commercial centers. The city helped to organize a local group, Saint Marks Area Main Street Inc., in 1999 to revitalize the business district. One of its most remarkable successes in this mission, thanks to the vision and entrepreneurial spirit of longtime district resident Chris Douglass, is the hot new dining spot, the Ashmont Grill. Douglass, building on his first-rate Icarus, long a fine dining destination in the restaurant-rich South End, has brought his talent and energies to this corner of Dorchester with at least equivalent success.

The signage over the Ashmont Grill replaces the "o" in Ashmont with a red dot, signifying "Dotchesta" as the "r"-averse residents of this sprawling neighborhood call their turf. It also proclaims that it was "Established in 1959; Reborn in 2005." In fact, Douglass acquired the building in which the old restaurant was housed and took it down to the studs, wholly reconstructing it to its present chic appearance. When one enters, the eye is drawn to a giant, exposed-brick wall displaying four oversized rectangular photos mounted vertically, two with splashes of reds—tomatoes and flames—and two of everyday kitchen phenomena—boiling water and forks standing in a dishwasher. Handsome cherry-wood banquettes, booths and partitions divide the room into distinct sections, while a large, serpentine bar accommodates a dozen diners to the left of the entrance. A huge, silver-colored heating duct along the high, black ceiling runs parallel to rows of track spots. Tables of varying heights with contour-molded wooden chairs accommodate about 75 diners.

Douglass has put together a wine list that respects his clientele's pocketbooks. I chose the two lowest-priced red wines offered (both $20) on successive visits: a splendid 2004 Excelsior cabernet sauvignon from South Africa, fruity but full-bodied and well structured, and a 2003 Capestrano montepulciano d'Abruzzi, lighter and a little rough, but nevertheless a credible house wine at its bargain price.

The Ashmont prints a new menu daily, with specials cycling in and out of the lineup. Cod cakes ($7), a regular appetizer, consisted of three pingpong-ball-sized spheres of cod blended with mashed potatoes and then deep fried to a golden brown, accompanied by a well-assembled remoulade sauce. The mussels ($9) brought a huge bowl of clean, fresh, sweet mussels poached in white wine, herbs, a touch of tomato and garlic, and enlivened with nuggets of spicy chorizo. Grilled crostini bread crowned the dish, and a proper receptacle was provided for the shells. Escarole salad with pears and Great Hill blue cheese ($8.50) included shaved fennel and candied walnuts to adorn the curved leaves of the slightly bitter greens and succulent pears. The crunch of the nuts, the creamy, pleasantly sharp cheese (one of Massachusetts' premier agricultural products) and tender greens and fennel made a nice ensemble. Winter-vegetable soup ($7) combined carrots, parsnips, celery and nuggets of smoky, savory ham to delight the palette and warm the soul.

In addition to starters, main courses and sides, the menu offers pizzas and sandwiches. Pizzas include the "Peabody Square," topped with chicken, bacon, roasted tomatoes, garlic, ricotta and mozzarella. While the toppings delighted, the crust disappointed with its lackluster flavor and texture, neither crisp nor chewy. Of the sandwiches, the River Rock burger, named for the pasture-raised beef from which it's made, was flavorful, juicy and medium-rare as ordered. The huge, doughy roll did not measure up to the quality of the burger, but the half-sour pickles and spicy slaw accompaniment hit the spot. The Cuban sandwich ($8) contained roasted pork loin, ham, cheese and thin-sliced half-sour pickles, a toothsome melange of tasty ingredients on a fresh, pleasantly flavored roll.

Moving to the main courses, the wood-grilled flat-iron steak ($17), sliced on the bias like London broil and served medium-rare (as specified on the menu) was tender but resilient, with robust flavor enhanced by garlic butter. The first-rate texture and fresh flavor of the pan-roasted cod ($16) made me wish that the size of the portion had been a little less skimpy, but the delicious garnish of tender sautéed leeks and fennel made up for the cod's small size. Wood-grilled pork loin ($17) with cranberry-apple chutney brought a thick, tender slab of juicy pork. The sweet-tart compote of cranberries and apples provided a remarkably compatible counterpoint to the meaty goodness of the pork.

Finally, St. Louis–style barbecued ribs ($16.50) emerged tasty and tender from their long bath in a marinade of vinegar, fruit and herbs, followed by slow cooking in a remote corner of Douglass' custom-made wood grill (created by a craftsman in New Hampshire). A lively apricot-chili barbecue sauce complemented the flavorful meat. Of the side dishes offered by Ashmont, the grilled chicory ($3) and roasted Brussels sprouts ($3.50), both served in a gondola-shaped ramekin, were splendid. The chicory had a touch of lemon along with garlic, adding to its savory goodness. The Brussels sprouts profited from Douglass' wood grill, which roasted every bit of bitterness out of them, producing mellow, full-flavored, pleasantly resilient gems, with the delightful crunch and subtle but distinctive flavor of pine nuts adding a welcome dimension. Next to the escarole and Brussels sprouts, the hand-cut fries ($3) seemed beside the point, arriving at our table less than hot and fresh.

Unusual for a neighborhood bistro, Ashmont has its own pastry chef, Diane Devlin. Her lemon roulade ($6), a stout cylinder of moist cake folded around slightly tart lemon crème, came in a pool of gloriously rich blueberry sauce and with a small scoop of ginger ice cream. Pecan pie, a dense confection of pecans and caramelized corn syrup, had dark-chocolate sauce drizzled across its top and an accompanying scoop of rich, fudgy ice cream. Finally, and most delicious of Devlin's creations, a huge block of warm apple bread pudding combined moist apple and mildly sweet cake, laced with an exquisite caramel sauce and garnished with whipped cream.

The Ashmont Grill has been very busy from the day it opened. The anticipation in the neighborhood and around the city—thanks to extensive pre-opening publicity throughout the local newspapers—has reportedly filled the place nightly. Despite the throngs of hungry diners on the two evenings of my visits, service was prompt, efficient, knowledgeable, friendly and attentive, but not hovering. The place was far too busy for hovering. He's the playful, urbane, Harvard-educated restaurateur who, along with chef Michael Schlow and their partner Esti Parsons, established Radius as a Boston dining landmark. She's the reserved, marathon-running, Harvard-educated pastry chef who opened Flour in the Washington Street neighborhood of the South End before it caught on as the hottest place to open a restaurant. They met years ago, traveled as friends to China, and one thing led to another until, on New Year's Eve in Paris, Christopher Myers and Joanne Chang took a fateful walk along the Seine.

Flour's Joanne Chang with her fiance, Radius co-owner Christopher Myers.

"Between Le Pont des Invalides and the next pont, whose yummy name eludes me right now, I whispered in her ear," he recalls. In the shadow of the Eiffel Tower, Myers proposed marriage to Chang. She, of course, said yes. No wedding date has been set, but you can be sure the cake will be delicious.

SECOND COURSE

Forget T.S. Eliot. When it comes to living in New England, March is the cruelest month, as icy, slushy winter lingers on long after the charms of hearty stews and dining by the fireplace have worn thin. This March, though, there's hope for a more cheerful end to our gloomiest season: The first Boston Winter Restaurant Week takes place from March 5-10, offering three-course prix-fixe menus at over 90 restaurants in Boston, Cambridge and beyond (sometimes far beyond: Silks at Stonehedge Inn in Tyngsboro is a participant). If you've enjoyed the last few years of Boston Restaurant Week in August, you know the drill: Lunches are priced at $20.06, dinners at $30.06. So far, the lineup of participating restaurants includes Meritage at the Boston Harbor Hotel, UpStairs on the Square, Legal Sea Foods, Brasserie Jo at the Colonnade Hotel, Harvest and Sandrine's Bistro. The complete list will be posted online Feb. 6 at the Greater Boston Convention and Visitors Bureau Web site: www.bostonusa.com/restaurantweek.

A sure bet: When the Langham Hotel is able to lure a star pastry chef from the Wynn in Las Vegas, you know they're on a roll. More big changes are in store at the former Meridien, but what's official now is new executive pastry chef Alejandro Luna. A mere 25 years old, Luna is revamping the Langham's signature Chocolate Bar to focus more on individual portions than, for example, slices of cake, and he's instituted a monthly Chocolate Art Showpiece. Currently, it's a four-foot-high tree covered in handmade chocolate leaves, flowers and butterflies, topped with a chocolate birdhouse. So far, there's been no sign of chocolate squirrels....

Forgot to get a flu shot? Adventurous diners will be enticed to satisfy their appetites (and boost their immune systems) with the citrus-intensive prix-fixe dinners at sister restaurants Bricco and Mare, available every day in February except for Valentine's Day. At Bricco, it's three courses for $50, including fennel soufflé with blood orange coulis and blood orange–arugula salad, poached scallops with gnocchetti, and blood orange sorbet. At Mare, it's four courses for $60, featuring monkfish with blood orange–ginger mostarda.

Status update: After a mid-January fire, Croma on Newbury Street is closed for renovations. It's slated to re-open in early April with a redesigned kitchen and expanded menu... Cuvee on Newbury Street has closed its doors... In the South End, Stella is now serving Sunday brunch, and Union Bar & Grille is offering a prix-fixe Saturday brunch for $11.95. Next column: Big changes in store for Mantra...Ex–Great Bay chef Jeremy Sewall's new restaurant... IB

SPIRITS

BY SANDY BLOCK MW

The spirits classes I teach for wine lovers always start out covering Cognac, then move on to Armagnac, single-malt Scotch, Irish whiskey, Bourbon and rum—in that sequence. In other words, we go from tasting the most prestigious and expensive of distillates to the one with the least cachet. Invariably, regardless of who's in the group, the reaction is identical: Few can stomach the Cognac, more like the Armagnac, the mellower grain-based distillates are preferred by a larger group and the rum is a near-universal favorite. The least costly category turns out to be the most delicious. Everyone is surprised except me, because I've seen it happen so many times.

Rum has an image in this country predominantly as a low-key mixer in popular cocktails and that's probably the way most of it is consumed: mixed with stronger-flavored Coke and fruit juices, or in daiquiris, punches, mojitos or piña coladas. It's relatively inexpensive to produce (either directly from sugarcane or from one of its byproducts, molasses) and tends to have an appealing perfume, if not much flavor. Every country in the Caribbean, it seems, has its own preferred style and its own brands. Many rums that are popular in the U.S., where Bacardi holds a dominant (nearly 50 percent) share of the market, are flavored, in the manner that has become so fashionable with vodkas, so that whatever characteristics the original distillate itself may have had are masked by stronger fruit, spice or vanilla accents. In fact, rum is so adaptable and easy to combine with a variety of mixers that it's second only to vodka in annual sales in the U.S. Worldwide, rum is actually the sales leader.

Rum has a long history in the U.S., with roots dating back to colonial days. For most of America's past, before vodka was ever heard of, rum was the most widely consumed spirit. Leaving aside the flavorings, which mask whatever natural taste may have survived distillation, rums actually display a great deal of stylistic variety based on how and where they are made. The most dramatic differences among rums relate to the length of time they were aged. Light or silver rums spend time in casks only minimally, whereas the darker rums can undergo several years of prolonged cask maturation. Color, however, is not a thoroughly reliable guide to age, as it's legal almost everywhere to deepen the hue of a relatively youthful rum by adding caramel. Just like Cognacs or single-barrel Bourbons, however, older rums that have spent years maturing in casks take on characteristics of flavor and aroma that can be emulated but never faked through color manipulation. So while dark color saturation does not always serve as a reliable guide to quality, it can and often does indicate a particular style: stronger flavored, more intensity, more uniqueness.

So-called sipping rums are a completely different beverage, a world apart from the ubiquitous light or silver rums, which are designed to fade into the background in tropical, fruit juice–based drinks. The best have an immediately sensual appeal that involves not just flavor and aroma but also texture. They're velvety and smooth, without the harsh alcoholic bite of many other premium spirits. These primarily deeper colored, more aromatic rums tend to hail from Jamaica, Haiti, Martinique, Venezuela and the countries of Central America.

The best I've ever had is Ron Zacapa Centenario. It's a 23-year-old aged Guatemalan rum that has the caramel-like nuttiness of a 20-year-old tawny port, with a deep, golden-brown color and viscosity to match. It's even a little sweet. Although its primary destiny is to be savored straight up, undiluted, this is a rum so versatile that it can easily double as a dessert beverage. It's also spectacular as part of a cocktail, provided what it's being mixed with has as much character, concentrated flavor and lushness as the Centenario does.

Zacapa is distilled in the exact same manner as other rums, but it ages for an extended period in Bourbon and sherry barrels stored at very high elevations in the Guatemalan mountains. This causes a significant percentage of water in the spirit to evaporate over the years, enriching the rum, and it encourages thorough extraction of smoke-, vanilla- and nut-flavor nuances from the wood. It's relatively expensive for rum (about $40) but far less costly than comparably aged Cognacs or single malts. It tends to win people over on their first taste because it's a revelation to many that this magnificent-tasting nectar is somehow connected because of its heritage with the light, watery rums that tend to be summertime staples. But be forewarned: Tasting Ron Zacapa has been known to make some people lose any interest in other distilled spirits. IB

CityScope: Saving the Brattle

It's hard to imagine Cambridge without the Brattle—primarily a film house since the 1950s, its history in the arts dates back more than 100 years. But the Brattle, like so many of its kind, is in financial trouble, and Arlington's Regent Theatre is pitching in for the latest fundraising effort. On Feb. 16, the Regent plays host to the Battle for the Brattle, a party with live musical performances by local acts like Robin Lane and the Chartbusters, Willie Loco Alexander and the Boom Boom Band, and the Twinemen, as well as food from Blue Ribbon BBQ. Proceeds support the Brattle's efforts to remain open on Brattle St. in Harvard Square and also support Zeitgeist Gallery's relocation to Hampshire Street in Inman Square. 7 Medford St., Arlington (781-646-4849). www.regenttheatre.com. Feb. 16, 7:30 pm. $20–$25. —RL

FRI./FEB. 10–FRI./FEB. 17

Classical Music: Rock Me Amadeus

Mozart's 250th birthday may be over (it took place Jan. 27), but Boston just can't get enough of the magnificent maestro: The celebration continues throughout the month with happenings all over the city. World-renowned pianist and Chicago Symphony Orchestra conductor Daniel Barenboim performs as a soloist and conductor with the Staatskapelle Berlin orchestra in an all-Mozart program at Symphony Hall Feb. 10 ($33–$88). Coro Allegro, a chorus for members and friends of the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender communities celebrates its 15th anniversary Feb. 12 with a performance of Mozart's Requiem at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge ($20–$48). The Handel and Haydn Society presents selections from Mozart's operas, including Idomeneo, The Magic Flute and Thamos, King of Egypt at Symphony Hall Feb. 17 ($15–$63). Finally, the Biava String Quartet, joined by professor Marcus Thompson on viola, performs Mozart's Viola Quintet in C minor at MIT's Kresge Auditorium, also Feb. 17 (Free). See the classical music calendar section for times and addresses of the events. —LPK

TUE./FEB. 14

Museums and Galleries: Love in the Afternoon

Can't sneak out of the office for an afternoon tryst with your sweetie this Valentine's Day? If so, hotfoot it over to the the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum's Art of Romance event for couples. Picture you and your S.O. perusing [illegible] art, dining under the Venetian garden–inspired glass-roofed courtyard, [illegible] red cocktails and V-Day desserts in the Gardner Cafe. To cap it off, you can get serenaded by jazz artist Lucas Madrazo, who performs romantic ballads from 12–1:30 pm in the courtyard. 280 The Fenway, Boston (617-566-1401). www.gardnermuseum.org. 11 am–5 pm. Free with museum admission. —LPK

SUN./FEB. 12

Music: Hasidic Hipster

You might not put the words Hasidic and Reggae together, but up-and-coming musician Matisyahu has (who else can count Bob Marley and Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach as their top musical influences?), and he performs his exuberant blend of sounds and styles at Avalon on Feb. 12. Born Matthew Miller, the Pennsylvania kid with a conservative Jewish upbringing turned to Orthodox Judaism while living in Brooklyn around 2001, yet didn't let it stand in the way of becoming a star. For him, making music is a serious endeavor, but he's not above doing the occasional stage dive. Matisyahu refuses to perform on Friday nights (the Jewish Sabbath) and sports an onstage persona that includes long hair and a mighty beard, a black top hat and traditional Orthodox garb. Matisyahu released his debut album, Shake Off the Dust. Arise, in 2004, and although the freshman effort created only small buzz, 2005's Live at Stubb's album, including the single "King Without a Crown," gave him a certified cult following. The kosher crooner's third album, Youth, drops on March 7, a few weeks after his Boston show. 15 Lansdowne St., Boston (617-931-2000). www.ticketmaster.com. 7 pm. $22. —RL

Tastings: Public Broadcasting Bonanza

On the weekend of Feb. 16–19, the public broadcasting big wigs let their hair down for the annual WGBH Wine and Food Weekend at the Seaport Hotel. This year's event includes a Thursday night formal Vintner Dinner; Saturday seminars and tastings, as well as Master Cooking and Wine classes led by local pros like Legal Sea Foods executive chef Rich Vellante and Master of Wine Sandy Block; and a Sunday morning Jazz Brunch that celebrates 25 years of the radio program "Jazz with Eric in the Evening." There's also a live auction on Saturday night of rare and fine wines, and all the proceeds from the weekend support WGBH's efforts to produce educational public broadcasting. *1 Seaport Lane, Boston (617-300-3999). Clear and Present Boredom Firewall rolls off the Ford assembly line.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Harrison Ford is a likable enough actor. But if it was ever unclear that the guy is as stale as a muffin from last summer, Firewall removes any doubt. In this tale of a bank security chief who's blackmailed into helping robbers steal millions, his character may save the day, as usual. But the movie is more likely to ruin your night out.

For a star who's made movie after movie playing guys who take life-threatening risks to get out of jams, Ford has led an awfully timid career. Sure, he doesn't have the greatest emotional range onscreen and realizing his own limitations has helped to keep him on the A-list for decades. But, sitting through Firewall, you have to wonder whether Ford ever inadvertently started saying dialogue from Frantic, Patriot Games, The Fugitive or Air Force One during its making, since elements from all of them figure into his latest release. And anything that doesn't feel plucked from previous Ford movies just seems to come from other people's movies—like Ransom (both versions), Hostage, The Desperate Hours (both versions) and, on the small screen, the first season of 24.

Harrison Ford is in a bad situation, in more ways than one, in Firewall

Even without its warmed-over premise, Firewall has credibility problems. With his perpetually puzzled facial expressions, Ford doesn't exactly convince you he's Mr. Software Wizard, the brains behind a Seattle bank's computer security system that keeps hackers from digitally cleaning out the vaults. Yet, there's Ford as Jack Stanfield, uttering vague techno–mumbo jumbo that he, and perhaps no one, could make believable.

Before you can say "binary code," though, trouble enters in the form of Cox (Paul Bettany). This businessman approaches Ford through a security colleague (Robert Forster) about hiring them [illegible] from the bank, which is to merge with a larger bank [illegible] already has its own security honcho (Robert Patrick).

Cox keeps up his cover for all of two minutes of screen time. When the afterwork sit-down with Jack and friend ends, Cox jumps into Jack's car and pulls a gun on him—at the exact moment Cox's crew of four men is invading Jack's home and taking his architect wife (Virginia Madsen) and kids (Carly Schroeder, Jimmy Bennett) hostage.

Do I really need to tell you what happens? Are you really expecting anything beyond the predictable? Because if you are, you've truly come to the wrong place.

OK, the wife and kids cower, Jack tries to worm the family's way out of the situation and, when there's no other way out, he has to take Cox to the bank with him, with Cox posing as a "businessman" once again as the two carry out an elaborate scheme to transfer $10,000 from each of the bank's 10,000 wealthiest accounts into Cox's offshore accounts. But the robbery leaves Jack a wanted man. When he returns to his home to find Cox's crew and his family gone, he realizes the robbery hasn't ended the danger for the Stanfields.

Firewall has more familiar contemporary-thriller twists, like Jack enlisting the help of his kooky secretary (Mary Lynn Rajskub) and the nerdy kid (Matthew Currie Holmes) who works in the bank's computer room. It also has contrivances, like the family dog (abducted with the family) having a GPS-equipped collar, as Jack eludes police and searches for the kidnappers. The combination of rehash, mumbo jumbo and contrivance makes you wonder if writer Joe Forte's life experience involves anything besides watching movies.

On one hand, Firewall is just a mediocre product that never dares to be anything different. It's like one of those chainstores whose outlets always look the same, whether you walk into one in Massachusetts or Montana—this is the standardized Harrison Ford multiplex thriller, and it feels as if it were made from a kit. In time, it will be interchangeable with the other Ford movies it recalls. But it also wastes the talents of at least a couple of other people who might be producing more interesting material.

One is Virginia Madsen, who isn't the most (or the 20th most) exciting actress working today. But she deserves better: her career gets rejuvenated by her meaty role in 2004's Sideways, her best in years, she gets back into the studio-movie mix and the best Hollywood has for her is the dreaded part of the "wife of a man who's more than 20 years older than she"? Ouch.

Similarly, director Richard Loncraine has made several fine movies in his native England, including Brimstone & Treacle and 1995's inspired, 1930s-set version of Richard III. In fact, he's already made a movie with the same premise of Firewall — 1987's Bellman and True—and it's as thrilling as Firewall is bland. It's nice to see Madsen and Loncraine get a high-paying gig like this, but I can't imagine them being creatively satisfied by it. I can't imagine Ford seeing this as anything more than a payday, either. iB

Firewall ★★

Directed by Richard Loncraine. Written by Joe Forte. With Harrison Ford, Paul Bettany, Virginia Madsen, Robert Patrick and Robert Forster. Rated PG-13. At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.

New Releases

Brokeback Mountain ★★★
Ang Lee's "gay cowboy movie" turns out to be more emotional and less sensational than you might expect. It's a 20-plus-year tale of two young cowboys (Heath Ledger, Jake Gyllenhaal) put together on a summer ranching job in 1963, who fall for each other despite saying they're "not queer." As each returns to his separate life, eventually involving an unsatisfying marriage for each man, they reconnect in a secret relationship during "fishing trips" on the mountain where they once herded sheep. Whenever the opportunity arises to live together and start a ranch over the next 20 years, one's fear of being found out thwarts the relationship from going further. The end result is a sad tale of frustration, self-censorship and a life together that never was, intimately told, with no villains beyond those unseen societal forces inhibiting the two men. Ledger's performance as the close-mouthed cowpoke we see most can be mannered, but the earthy restraint of the movie—in its staging and its tight focus on its characters—adds to its effectively melancholy mood. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square, Coolidge Corner and suburbs.)

Bubble ★★½
Surely not the liveliest movie Steven Soderbergh (Out of Sight, Erin Brockovich) has made, but this stripped-down tale featuring a cast of non-professionals is infinitely better than his first collaboration with writer Coleman Hough, 2002's Full Frontal. It's the story of coworkers at an Ohio Valley doll factory, and how the arrival of a new young worker (Misty Dawn Wilkins) affects the relationship between seemingly content Martha (Debbie Doebereiner) and the young man she calls her best friend, Kyle (Dustin James Ashley). The tension here is almost all under the surface, which is interesting on one level but also means the film's surface elements remain spare (and it never achieves the gritty lyricism of last year's Keane, which Soderbergh produced). Of course, the ironic thing about this low-budget tale is that, with its fixed camera and choreographed shots of characters at mundane moments, it's less off-the-cuff than one of Soderbergh's best Hollywood movies. But this is clearly the most vital of Soderbergh's occasional "experimental" projects. (At Kendall Square.)

Fun with Dick & Jane ★★½
From a creative standpoint, remaking a generally forgotten movie like this makes more sense than remaking King Kong. Not that this is likely to be one of Jim Carrey's more memorable movies, but writers Judd Apatow and Nicholas Stoller cleverly update the 1977 tale of a financially strapped suburban couple that takes to armed robbery, making him an employee of an Enron-like company that crashes and burns, with the higher-ups making out like bandits and the rank-and-file losing jobs, stock investments and pensions. Carrey plays one such palooka (he's promoted to V.P. of communications solely to be the public face of the company on the day it tanks), Téa Leoni is his wife (who's quit her job just in time for the family crisis) and Alec Baldwin is funny as the two-faced company CEO who's one-half Kenneth Lay, one-half Dubya and all charlatan. The action never gets more than mildly amusing, but this is still better than expected. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Good Night, and Good Luck ★★★½
There's passion dripping from George Clooney's 1950s tale—for journalism, for liberty, for moviemaking. Filmed in an evocative, cigarette-smoke-filled black-and-white, his second movie as director chronicles the decision by CBS TV's no-nonsense star journalist, Edward R. Murrow (David Strathairn), to take on Sen. Joseph McCarthy, the Communist-hunting bully. Murrow's on-air bravery helps turn the tide against McCarthy, and beneath the tense story of dilemmas and decisions—told in a vibrant style in which the camera often seems to "find" the action, documentary-style—are the issues of the role of journalism and the larger matter of what it means to be an American. Clooney sets the tone for the movie by not taking the lead role. Instead, he plays Murrow's producer, Fred Friendly. Similarly, the movie doesn't grandstand or go for "big moments," and Strathairn not only catches Murrow's distinctively clipped cadence, he also lets that cadence suggest the moral precision that defines the character, as well as the movie. (At Kendall Square and Embassy Waltham.)

King Kong ★★★
Peter Jackson's remake will never replace the inventive original, but it clearly has more to offer than the 1976 remake. Retaining the early-1930s setting, Jackson turns Merian C. Cooper's original into an often thrilling, sometimes bloated succession of set pieces, as a showman full of ideas (Jack Black) takes stars (Naomi Watts, Kyle Chandler), a screenwriter (Adrien Brody) and a crew to find "undiscovered" Skull Island and film an adventure movie. Not only do they find the island and its natives, they also find the supersized title character (rendered in impressively expressive CGI), who takes a shine to the actress. Some of the best sequences replicate the original—including Kong's battle with a T. Rex (three of them, in this case) and the scene in which he shakes humans off a tree-trunk bridge to their deaths. Jackson also adds seat-squirming action with monstrous creepy-crawlies and huge worms. The story pushes the romance between Watts' actress and Brody's writer too hard, and the climactic, top-of-the–Empire State Building sequence drags on, but the production design and visual effects in the New York scenes are dazzling and, as in Cooper's version, Black's character becomes a surrogate for the filmmaker, with Jackson poking fun at this ballsy but insincere showman. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Looking for Comedy in the Muslim World ★★

Albert Brooks has long made movies in which his characters were self-absorbed and oblivious to others' needs. That was part of what was funny, but that wasn't the end goal of the comedy in his early movies (the still-hilarious Real Life, Modern Romance and Lost in America). The way those characters acted rubbed others the wrong way, and that's where another level of comedy came in, too. But it's been more than 20 years since those movies, and that second layer of comedy has slowly vanished from the movies Brooks has made since. In his latest, it's just not there, which makes the movie a one-joke picture. In it, Brooks plays a particularly inept version of himself who's asked by the government to travel to the Middle East and write a 500-page report on what makes Muslims laugh, in order to foster our understanding of foreigners. The joke is supposed to be that Brooks is so clueless and uninterested in his mission that he repeatedly bungles it. But because his native assistant (Sheetal Sheth) and his two State Deparment handlers (John Carroll Lynch, Jon Tenney)—who should all know better—generally just nod along with every stupid idea he has, it's rarely funny. Typical of the movie and supposedly part of the joke is that the government doesn't even bother to send him to a Muslim-majority country; they send him to India, which has a large Muslim minority, instead. But that's more lame than funny, and speaks to how half-hearted this seems. If Brooks couldn't or wouldn't shoot in a Muslim-majority country, he should have still set the movie in a country like that, even an unnamed one à la Syriana. This is fiction. What are they going to do, put Brooks in movie jail? (At Harvard Square and the Embassy Waltham.)

The Matador ★★★

Writer-director Richard Shepard's blend of rowdy comedy, middle-aged blues riff and gripping thriller is an amiable shaggy dog. Shepard has been making low-budget, barely released movies for over a decade, some bad (The Linguini Incident) and some good (Oxygen, with Adrien Brody and Maura Tierney). He's stepping up in class here, and he gets fine performances from Pierce Brosnan and Greg Kinnear, who play, respectively, a dashing but burned-out hitman and a decent Denver businessman desperately trying to stop an indecent losing streak in life. The two meet in a Mexico City hotel bar and become uneasy buddies, and the actors let us see the vulnerable people behind their characters' surfaces. The movie's funny/ dangerous mix of crime and comedy places it firmly in Elmore Leonard territory, and though it lacks the personality and laugh count of the best Leonard adaptations (Out of Sight and Get Shorty), it holds its own better than most Leonard imitations. (At Boston Common.)

Match Point ★★½

After making predominantly unfunny comedies for the last decade, Woody Allen has shown a little smarts by making his first drama since 1989's Crimes and Misdemeanors, with which this ultimately bears some similarity. It also shakes up Allen's predictable routine by being set in London and not having a character who's just an Allen surrogate. The protagonist this time is a tennis instructor (Jonathan Rhys Myers) who falls in with a wealthy family, ultimately marrying into it and becoming a well-paid cog in the family business. But his affair with an American actress (Scarlett Johansson) that he loves more than his wife (Emily Mortimer) threatens his cushy new lifestyle, and he's forced to choose between love and comfort. It's well-acted and generally involving—and punctuated by opera arias that I'm sure have more relevance to those who know what's being played out in them (alas, I'm not one of those people). The trouble is that the wheels turn very slowly in the drama, and Allen, whose comedies are at least short and snappy, drags this out to an unnecessary 125 minutes that actually seem longer. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Munich ★★★

In Saving Private Ryan, Steven Spielberg opened with a horrific battle sequence, then spent the rest of the movie trying to convince you the ideals of World War II justified all that carnage. His latest takes a more somber approach to the effects of violence, especially on those who inflict it. Eric Bana stars as an Israeli soldier who, following the kidnapping and murder of the Israeli Olympic team at the 1972 summer games in Munich, is recruited to head a covert squad assigned to find and assassinate the Palestinians who planned the Olympic Village attack. The early action feels odd, as it has you rooting for the team (also including characters played by Daniel Craig and Ciaran Hinds) to kill people, especially since Spielberg withholds most of the Olympic violence until later flashbacks. Still, the movie functions as a well-oiled, globetrotting thriller full of nail-biting sequences, and the movie's sense of right and wrong, good and bad, isn't as fixed as it initially seems. As the squad leader gets deeper into the shadow world in which any ally might be an enemy, and in which helpful friends might have hidden agendas that aren't very friendly, he begins to question the value of fighting violence with violence. Does his violence just create more enemies? Does it really make him safer from attack? Whether this is meant as a commentary on the current "war on terror" is debatable, but it's certainly food for thought. Aside from one very dubious piece of editing—in which Spielberg intercuts the final flashback of Olympic tragedy with a sex scene—this is solid, thoughtful stuff from Spielberg, a step up from last summer's War of the Worlds. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The New World ★★

There's effective cinematic storytelling, and there's ineffective cinematic storytelling. A love story in which the two lovers talk ceaselessly in voice-overs, but very little in dialogue to each other—as happens in Terrence Malick's latest—falls with a splat into the ineffective category. Like Malick's The Thin Red Line, this early-17th-century tale of the settlement of Jamestown has such a languorous pace that the action never quite gets involving. It's semi-interesting to have a more adult telling of the same story Disney polished up in Pocahontas, between Captain John Smith (Colin Farrell) and his teen–Native love, Pocahontas (Q'orianka Kilcher), but because of the movie's (and the lovers') communication gap, Malick never gets across what bonds the two lead characters besides their hot bods. So instead of a dreamy, passionate tale of European and Native American cultures colliding, this often seems more like a really long, slow Abercrombie & Fitch ad, and I'm not buying. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Syriana ★★★

Traffic writer Stephen Gaghan makes his debut as writer-director in this drama that essentially takes the same approach to the oil business as the earlier movie did to the drug trade—by looking at the intersection of business, politics and crime. There's a wide variety of characters and locations here, and through much of the first hour you pine for a scorecard to keep everyone and everything straight in your head: There's a CIA field agent (George Clooney) popping back and forth between Washington and the Middle East, a Saudi-like emirate full of palace intrigue, two Texas oil companies trying to merge, a D.C. lawyer (Jeffrey Wright) the oil companies hire to fend off the Department of Justice, an expatriate American energy analyst (Matt Damon) who becomes an adviser to the more progressive prince of the emirate (Alexander Siddig), and a Pakistani immigrant (Mazhar Munir) who loses his oil-refinery job in the Persian Gulf because of all the boardroom machinations. Despite the sheer complexity of the early going, the story comes together very potently in its second half, with a particularly chilling climax. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Three Burials of Melquiades Estrada ★★½

There's a lot to like in Tommy Lee Jones' directorial debut. He's made a western; he's collaborated with writer Guillermo Arriaga (Amores Perros), who creates another time-shifting ensemble story; he shows a Sam Peckinpah–like affection for the lonely spaces of the border area between Texas and Mexico, where this story of the murder of the title character, a Mexican cowboy (Julio Cedillo), takes place; and his cast includes lived-in performances by Melissa Leo, Dwight Yoakam, Barry Pepper, Levon Helm and Jones himself, among others. But in other ways Arriaga's script falls short. Character development is especially skimpy for Estrada, who remains a symbol instead of a character, and Pete (Jones), his Texan buddy who decides to do something about the mur-

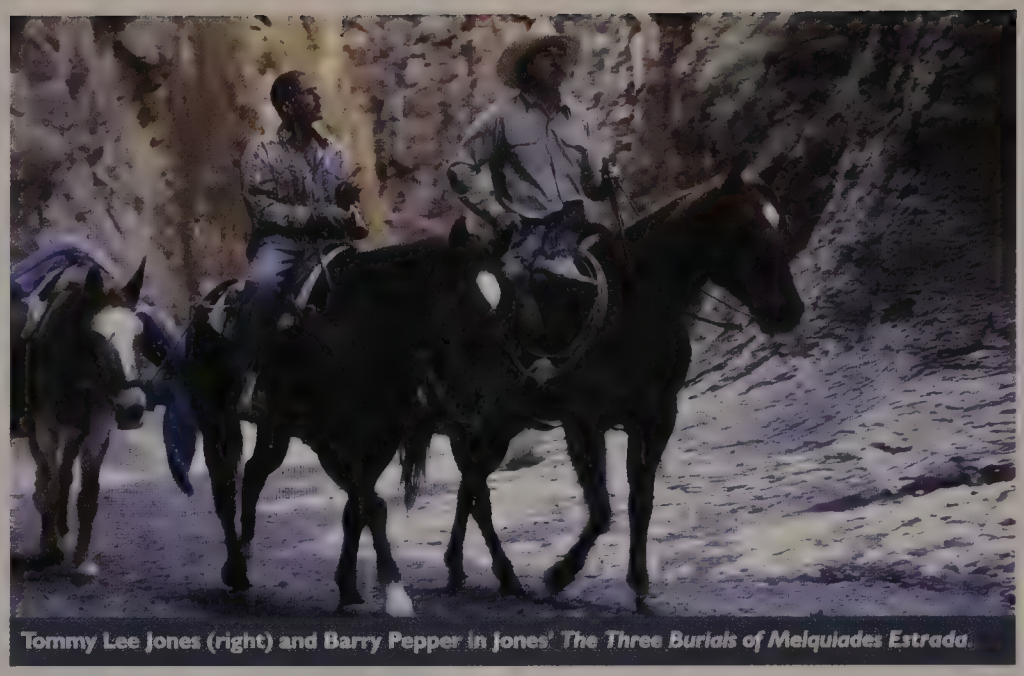
... the local sheriff (Yoakam) won't. Pete's ... which involves dragging the young border patrolman (Pepper) who shot Estrada into Mexico to bury the body and face the dead man's family, has its dramatic moments, like Helm's appearance as a suicidal blind man. But it also aspires to be an absurd journey that takes on irrational meaning for Pete, along the lines of Peckinpah's Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia. It comes nowhere near its inspiration on that level, so the results here are mixed. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Transamerica ★★

It's great to see Felicity Huffman of TV's late, great Sports Night (and now Desperate Housewives) get center stage in a movie, playing the pre-op male transsexual hero(ine) in this road movie. But, despite her convincing performance as a highly-strung, deeply sad man preparing for an imminent sex change, it's clear early on that first-time writer-director Duncan Tucker is going to keep the tale on a merely pleasant, surprisingly bland keel (it's even blander when weighed against the similarly gender-bending Breakfast on Pluto). Huffman's Stanley "Bree" Osbourne discovers he has a teenage son, and his shrink (Elizabeth Pena) requires him to meet the offspring (Kevin Zegers) before she'll sign off on the sex change. But all Tucker can concoct for these two is predictable tension as the strangers road-trip from New York to L.A. before their inevitable bonding, and sitcom-style hysterics when, after car trouble, the pair reluctantly stop at the house of Bree's estranged parents in Phoenix. Most of all, Tucker's movie seems like a pale version of The Station Agent, which was a more vivid, amusing and heartfelt peek at outsider characters. (At Kendall Square.)

Tristram Shandy: A Cock and Bull Story ★★★

It's an adaptation of a famous book that few have read, but in Michael Winterbottom's postmodern treatment, you may need to know more about the career of star Steve Coogan than about Laurence Sterne's 18th-century novel. Coogan, star of 24-Hour Party People, Around the World in 80 Days and TV's Alan Partridge series, stars as both the title character and as "Steve Coogan," the insecure actor starring in the movie. The action flits between Sterne's story and a behind-the-scenes looks at the making of the movie, with the latter being the most memorable, especially the scenes between Coogan and Rob Brydon, the co-star he fears might overshadow him. Coogan and Brydon, who it turns out have done lots of English TV comedy together, make a great team, though you sometimes get the impression they'd be just as funny improvising as they are in Winterbottom's elaborate scenario. The movie's good for many playful chuckles, though I doubt if that is all the writer-director is after. (At Kendall Square.)



Tommy Lee Jones (right) and Barry Pepper in Jones' The Three Burials of Melquiades Estrada

Walk the Line ★★★

Writer-director James Mangold's Johnny Cash biopic isn't Ray Lite, it's Ray White: rural Southern upbringing, childhood tragedy, musical talent, drugs a-plenty, 1960s meltdown, triumphant comeback on the way to icon status. As Jamie Foxx did in Ray, Joaquin Phoenix gives a strong, galvanizing performance as Cash, in a story that takes him from farmland to Folsom Prison concert and marriage to the woman he long pursued, June Carter (Reese Witherspoon). It's that pursuit that drags out the movie, though. Carter initially repels Cash's advances because they're both married when they first meet, then because he becomes a drugged-up wreck from not being with her. In addition to Cash's desire to please his forever-unimpressed dad (Robert Patrick)—who sees Johnny as inferior to his brother, who died as a kid—this thwarted affair is about the only motivation we're given for our hero. Phoenix gives Cash an earthy charm and Witherspoon makes Carter a smart spitfire. And they both gain points for doing their own vocals. But after a while, you want to say, "We get it! He wants to shack up with her!" Despite Cash's fiery comeback with the Folsom Prison concert (and its hit live album), the last third drags because of the monotony of the pursuit, taking some pep out of an otherwise evocative tribute to a musical legend. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Strip Job

Black Rebel Motorcycle Club uncovers its stylistic roots.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Black Rebel Motorcycle Club can blame selfishness not only for its downfall, but also for its redemption. That's what the California rockers found with Howl, a country-gospel-blues outing that was a stark shift from the band's Brit-styled fuzz and feedback, and graced many best-of-2005 lists.

"It was really a selfish record, in the best sense of the word, the way we really loved making it," says bassist-singer Robert Levon Been. "We learned that you have to enjoy it. Even if it doesn't come out, even if it's not heard, it's still worth it. We needed to find that again."

Consider the state of Black Rebel Motorcycle Club in 2004. Its second album, the presciently titled Take Them On, On Your Own, had failed to generate as much buzz as the band's 2001 debut B.R.M.C, and hard touring was taking a toll. The trio lost its record deal, its direction and—in the middle of a European tour—even drummer Nick Jago.

"We were standing onstage playing to 60,000 people at the Reading Festival, and it should've been a highlight, but it felt like we were all separated from our bodies," Been says of escalating tensions that led Jago to leave. "We were there, but not feeling it."

"Our perception got so f____ed up," he says. "There was a lot of selfishness, looking at your cut and what you want out of it, rather than knowing that the music that you've all made together is a great thing."

After losing their British-born drummer, guitarist-singer Peter Hayes considered quitting music before he and Been—friends since high school in San Francisco—reconvened to finish Howl in a friend's L.A. studio.

"We felt pretty beaten up that we'd lost Nick, who'd been with us from the beginning, and a part of ourselves," says Been, 27. "We needed to find a new reason for doing it again, to find an inspiring way to make music."

Inspiration came in country, soul and folk influences from their high-school days. "When we started, we were always playing acoustic guitars," says Been, who grew up liking Johnny Cash as well as the Beatles, Rolling Stones and Joy Division. "Peter was like a hard-core folkie. It was really irritating actually. He had a lot of bad little folk songs, and I tried to wean him toward the rock 'n' roll side. So we started off more rootsy. We learned how to be a rock band second."

Been wasn't always keen about a music career. Before the band sealed its reputation, he called himself Robert Turner to dodge associations with his father Michael Been, singer of '80s rockers the Call. "I wanted to do something different than my parents," he says from his L.A. home. "Once I started picking up guitar, it was a different story."

Been's father played piano on the Howl song "Promise," which also marked Jago's return to the sessions. "It was real simple when Nick came back," Been says. "He needed to find peace of mind, and I could understand and respect that."

It's not like the group needed a full-on drummer on every track. "Every time we tried to put a drum kit on 'Shuffle Your Feet,' it sounded like a bar rock band," Been says. "We tried to take the song apart, only use what we needed and do something different with the drums. So we stomped our feet on a picnic table for the kick and clapped our hands for the snare, for that two-and-four rhythm."

"It's not about religion," he adds of such gospel-styled songs. "It's about the sound. It's about that feeling in your gut, the melodies and people all singing together."

It's still a long shot from BRMC's first two albums, which echoed British outfits like the Jesus and Mary Chain, Oasis and T. Rex. "There weren't many American bands trying to do British-influenced music," Been says of that time. "Or if there were, they weren't doing it very well."

On tour as a quartet with a touring bassist, BRMC tries to equally represent all three CDs, but Been acknowledges the differences are tough for some fans. "We've done a lot of shows where Peter would come out and do the first two songs acoustically, then we'd come onstage and the whole show amps up and gets louder until the end is like a punk rock show," he says. "I'd go stand in the crowd and watch Peter play and overhear comments like 'Oh, is this going to be the whole f___in' show, or are they going to rock out?'"

Black Rebel Motorcycle grew up inspired by country, soul and folk music.

The same perceptions go for a band name taken from a biker gang in the Marlon Brando film The Wild One. "People still get the wrong idea, thinking we're this supercool and dark rock band," Been says. "It's a really heavy name to carry." iB

Dear Friends,
In the spirit of the New Year and the new beginnings, I would like to introduce you to my company and its Journeys of Imagination.

For 10 years, Quo Vadis has been the exclusive organizer of the WBUR Citizens of the World Tours. Superbly researched and organized, these tours were meant to educate and inform. The tours presented the world of news to our travelers and showed the world some well-informed, open and inquisitive American minds -- not a small deed in today's state of affairs!

The tradition of excellence continues with Quo Vadis. Our destinations are exotic and daring – from Transylvania and Crete to Libya and Bhutan. The groups are small, allowing for flexibility and creativity in the itinerary. We always travel as "friends sharing a good time", never as "bus tourists following an umbrella."

Please join us,
Roxana

IMPROPER sightings

UNLIKE THE REST OF YOUR FRIENDS, WE WANT TO SEE THE PHOTOS FROM YOUR NEXT TRIP.

Where do you take us? Send us a picture of you or a friend, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed Improper Sightings.

Mark Kashgegian (holding magazine) and his Improper Posse were in Whitehouse, Jamaica, which is like the White House in Washington… in no way whatsoever.

Veronica Godoy and her son Samuel Gallegos checked out La Portada, a rock formation in northern Chile. It's just steps away from the Tropic of Capricorn, but not nearly as delicious as the Tropic of Candycorn.

California Sen. Chuck Poochigian and his wife, Debbie, remind us all of the climatic cruelties of Christmas in California.

Brookline native Marc McStay (in T-shirt and flip-flops) recently took a job working in Doha, Qatar. He'll be there for about a year, after which he'll McLeave.

Andrew Matzkin traveled to Lago Villarrica in Pucon, Chile, and subsequently nominated himself for the Sightings "Mustache of the Year" award.

IMMORTAL IMPERSONAL

Just A Word of Advice

It was Thursday, Jan. 11 at 1:15 pm, Federal and Franklin streets. To the out-of-shape jogger who yelled at the guy crossing the street, mind your own business! Who are you? What were you trying to prove? The guy wasn't interfering with traffic and certainly wasn't blocking your way. Did you feel like a big man? Did it impress the out-of-shape ugly woman you were with? You're in a city and should really be careful who you mouth off to. You could get hurt someday.

—A Witness

Let's Be Frank

Unfortunately, you have a hard time being Frank. You say that you pride yourself on telling the truth, yet every time you take a drink, you escape what's real. That's not honesty, babe. The good news is that you already know that you have this demon. Many people in your position won't even go that far. You'll need great courage, tremendous strength and the sheer determination to find your true self, so that you can really become and experience Frank for all the great and wonderful things he has to offer. Once that happens, you'll find and experience the true love you have always wanted. I continue to pray that you'll someday believe that this journey is worth it. You'll not be alone.

—UKN

Touched

It was Friday, Jan. 6, at the Bell in Hand. You were a pretty girl, about my age (early 20s), wearing a white shirt and jeans. My boyfriend and I were getting ready to leave and you came up and complimented me on my shirt, asking where I had bought it (Macy's). I complimented you on your dancing. I'm too shy to dance much, so I try to learn from others. Anyways, just wanted to let you know that I really appreciated your comment and that you put a smile on my face. It's good to know that there are nice, friendly girls in the bar/club scene. Thank you again.

—Girl with the Pink Shirt

Eggnog Anyone?

The holidays have come and gone, but for some reason I can't stop thinking about you. It was the day before Christmas Eve, and we were both shopping at J. Pace's in Saugus, along with a gazillion other people. You were picking up a pie or dessert of some sort and I was in front of you paying for this and that. You asked about the eggnog and I said that Richardson's had the best around. In the spirit of the holiday and because of your great smile, I shared so you could see for yourself. Good stuff, huh? You had a black Boston Police hockey shirt on with a Kangol cap and were driving a silver SUV. I'm not expecting a miracle connection, but I felt compelled to write and say that you're adorable and I hope that you had a wonderful holiday with your family and friends. Maybe our paths will cross again.

—Shared the Love

Can't Deny It

Laura, I love you. I'm sorry that isn't what you want to hear, but it's true. I understand your quest, but I hope you don't lose sight of what's important, especially when it comes to matters of the heart. If you say you don't love me anymore, I hope that you truly mean it. I'd rather spend the rest of my days remembering how I lost a love so true, than deny its existence to spare the wants or thoughts of others. You're an incredibly beautiful person. Thanks for the memories.

—Jbagadonuts

A Loyal Fan

We exchanged smiles at Ironside in Charlestown during the Patriots' playoff game. You, a petite blonde at the corner of the bar with your male co-worker. Me, brown hair, in a gray sweater standing near you for a few minutes until my friends and I moved to a table. I was about to head over to talk to you when you quickly left at halftime. I'd love to have a chance to talk.

—ironsidegame@yahoo.com

Dudes, Get a Clue

To the Men of Boston:
Having just arrived home from a night on the town with some girlfriends, and having just picked up the latest IMPROPER, we felt a need to write before we turn in for the night. There are many great guys in our city, but they are overshadowed by the complete jerks that frequent our bars. We're not sure where exactly you boys get your information from, but contrary to your apparent belief, being a prick does not make you seem a) more desirable or b) larger (in height or in social stature). In fact, it just makes you seem small and mean. It makes us sad to say this, as there really are so many great guys in Boston, but we find it unfair that some of you completely ruin (and frighten) an entire population of female 20-somethings. With your crude remarks "whispered" in your drunken stupor and your frat-boy behavior designed to elevate yourselves one rung higher than the Joe Schmo to your left, you reduce the beautiful, smart, caring and suddenly sad women of this city into disillusioned and weary girls who are now shaken by the idea of a night that could end with a lewd comment or by the prospect that she may be forced to end up with someone like you. As a plea to the single men of Boston, from the single ladies you love, please, please treat us like your mother taught you to. Don't be such cowards that you act in ways that embarrass your sensibilities but get you a high five. Have the courage to be the man you know you can be, the man your father wanted you to be, the man you know you are deep down in a place that matters more than reputation. We'll be waiting for you...

—So Disappointed

rockie horoscope

FEBRUARY 8 – 21, 2006 BY ROCKIE GARDINER

AQUARIUS JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

Visual artists, actors, musicians, dancers, fishermen and pharmacologist professions ruled by Neptune may wind up in the news while the Aquarius sun and media-wise Mercury circle around the God of the Sea. Also the spotlight provided by the Leo full moon, the sign of your cosmic companion, can make it difficult to enjoy a quiet, romantic Valentine's Day—not to mention how all this unwanted attention may affect your birthday celebration. But if Oprah, Ellen, Aniston and even Ashton Kutcher, got used to it, so can you.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Wildly contradictory influences are at work, so if you feel like a yo-yo, this is why. Since the humanistic Aquarius sun and expressive Mercury are currently under the spell of your idealistic Neptune ruler, it's likely that you believe more things are possible than they are. Silly Fish! While you might not hear a discouraging word until President's Day weekend, you'd better find a way to keep your temper and tongue in check on Valentine's Day. Otherwise you could blow even the best laid plans to smithereens.

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Hot-blooded Rams, whether single or attached, could be making plans for Valentine's Day with the same degree of enthusiasm they had for the Super Bowl. No more, no less. However, keep in mind that this year a one-on-one romantic getaway might not be as fulfilling as inviting a house full of party animals over to celebrate the Lion's full moon. Why not? Although your horny Mars ruler will remain in sensuous Taurus for a few more days, sparks between you and another sign won't fly until President's Day weekend.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

You may not be the chosen one this week, but there's a chance that your partner, or whatever you're calling the person or people you're currently involved with, is. It's safe to assume that their good fortune, be it a promotion at work, a glowing review or a Super Bowl payoff, will rub off on you. This Valentine's Day can be particularly satisfying because your no-longer retrograde Venus ruler in status-conscious Capricorn is finally making discernible progress as she joins generous Jupiter. Luxury and laughs are a given; true love, a maybe.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

Remember that while unpredictable Uranus has your Pisces career house wired, you're liable to get a shock to your system at any moment. Although adaptable Gemini can become bored with regularity and stability, sometimes you want assurances that there's a comfy cushion to fall back on. This is NOT one of those times. Besides the start of your Mercury ruler's choppy voyage through Pisces on the 8th, you're about to get a bi-annual visit from impetuous, excitable Mars. It'll transit Gemini from Feb. 17 until the Aries-Libra full moon Easter Week.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Sex, death and other people's money is the area, broad as it may seem, that can hold your attention for a couple of weeks. The mysterious eighth house is indeed fascinating and a hot spot to explore on Valentine's Day; however, the artistry, spirituality and wisdom offered by your Pisces ninth house is where you're headed. Luckily, Crabs continue to have easy access to lovely and loving partners, at least until March 5. That's when Venus leaves your Capricorn marriage house where the goddess has been hanging out since Nov. 5.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Whether you're still thinking about it or are already in the process, while your sun ruler is being pressured by ever-expansive, ever-expensive Jupiter, moving up, building an addition to the house, maybe even enlarging the family, could be your chief concern. In another week, when the sun squares ambitious Mars in your midheaven, career advancement or community involvement might become your main focus, but that won't last as long as feathering your nest will. Meanwhile, prospects for a passionate Valentine's Day look good. Plan ahead.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

If you've felt stymied lately, trying to figure out why projects aren't progressing fast enough, it may help to learn that once your Mercury ruler enters fluid Pisces on the 8th, whatever you're interested in speeds up. Whether it'll be smooth going depends on the aspects Mercury makes. Deep thinkers can become even more unfathomable when the Messenger conspires with secretive Pluto. Flash-in-the-pan types may seem particularly brilliant while Mercury merges with electric, erotic Uranus on Valentine's Day. Talk about a mind meld!

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Libras tend to make a big deal out of any holiday celebration, but few occasions tweak your artistic imagination like Valentine's Day. Even the cynics among you can be cheered by the ubiquitous hearts and flowers, chocolates and champagne. Just be aware that having generous "eat, drink and be merry" Jupiter in your Scorpio money house this year could cost you much more than you intend to spend. Still and all, since your Venus ruler and Jupiter are on such friendly terms that day, why not go all out?

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Faith (in your team?) and a favorite fantasy that (you won big?) could be dominating your thoughts. Don't be surprised if you're willing to take a greater risk this month than security-conscious Scorpio is known for. That's because Jupiter in your sign is urging you to expand beyond your comfort zone, ultimately to claim more territory than you currently control. Keep this in mind when planning how best to deal with Valentine's Day. Hint, hint: Amenable Venus favoring lucky Jupiter that day increases your chances for success. Vegas?

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Read for Scorpio. They, along with Capricorn, Libra and Taurus, will benefit from the friendly and fortunate relationship your Jupiter ruler enjoys with Venus this month. It may narrow your choice of signs to hook up with; however, Leo and Aquarius also make good companions especially during the full moon that weekend. Be diplomatic, but for peace of mind, avoid spending time with Gemini, Virgo or Pisces while very vocal Mercury weds erratic, explosive Uranus on Valentine's Day.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

Enough with the delays and postponements! Now that Venus in Capricorn is facing forward again, go ahead and order the invitations, schedule the procedure, make plans to make yourself even more beautiful. You still have protective Jupiter riding shot gun, making sure that you get what you want. Only try to keep your new, improved vision within reasonable limits and at a reasonable cost. Perhaps that's easier said than the planetary energy coming out of your Aquarius money house; while imaginative, it's somewhat delusional.

For Bridesmaids only...

Doesn't your best friend deserve a first-class last fling, all the way to last call? Then let The Bustonian do all the work. We'll stock The Bustonian with a treasure chest of naughty bachelorette favors, including some even you wouldn't think of.

You can start with a champagne toast, then head into your favorite nightclub so the bride-to-be can make out with a stranger for the last time while you dirty dance the night away with some aspiring actor or shoe salesman you've never laid eyes on before. And any time you like, you can all boogie down on Boston's only mobile dance floor, letting it all hang out the windows as we cruise the town.

Go ahead – we'll never tell.
And she'll never remember.

For Bestmen ONLY...

Here's your chance to return the favor to the "best friend" who talked you into playing leapfrog on stage with a 250-lb. stripper right in front of your future father-in-law.

Let The Bustonian do all the work for his bachelor party – and learn the true meaning of "payback's a bitch." We'll stock The Bustonian with your poison of choice, which you can drink from a can, bottle, or glass, or right out of our giant ice bucket. Then it's on to a good old-fashioned pub crawl before heading to your favorite bar, where you can talk him into dropping his pants and singing Jingle Bells, and announcing that he is the best-hung elf south of the North Pole.

Go ahead – we'll never tell.
And he'll never remember.

LAST SCENE HERE

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

THE FIFTH TIME'S A CHARM...

Say what you will about Mayor Menino. The guy knows how to throw a party.

His Inaugural Ball was held at the Boston Public Library, where 1,200 revelers from all walks of life—from power brokers to plebeians—gathered to help Hizzonah mark the start of his fifth term, while getting 2006 off to a shockingly rollicking start (especially given that it was a Monday night hard on the heels of the holidays).

Anyone expecting your typical political get-together (vulcanized chicken in mucous sauce, served in an antiseptic room decorated with a few balloons) was sorely disappointed. For starters, the building's façade was awash with the city's official seal projected in light, while inside the library was transformed into five distinct party spaces following the theme "Our colorful city," that beggared the grooviest of nightclubs.

Among the more recognizable faces in the crowd: ex-Hancock jefe Dave D'Alessandro, ubiquitous party pair Lynne and Gary Smith, the incomparable Hat Sisters, soignée silver fox Pamela Humphrey, blarney-kissing pub owner Austin O'Connor and restaurateurs Jim Apteker of the State Room and Darryl Settles of Bob's Southern Bistro, the achingly lovely Stephanie Warburg and her investment banker son, Fred, eminence grise Jerry Finegold, newspaper publisher Josh Resnick, nightlife diva Mindy D'Arbeloff, the North End's notorious Mattaliano sisters, Barbara and Debra, former football star and current Parks and Recreation bigwig Gavin Veris (sporting his gigantic 1986 Super Bowl ring), theater impresario Tony McLean, attorney-about-town Larry DiCara, Copley Plaza grande dame Peggy Dray, power pair Frances and Bud Moseley, food scribe Corby Kummer, high-tech cutie Lexie Gross, patrician pixie Trish Fuller, BPL honcho Bernie Margolis and one guest who said, "It's refreshing to be in a room where I don't know anyone."

Perhaps due to the eclectic blend of people, the vibe was amazingly raging, and by 10 pm, when it was scheduled to end, the party showed no signs of slowing, but as one guest pointed out, "It's not like anyone's gonna call the cops." "Yeah," someone else agreed. "Especially since they're already here."

IF A HANNA-BARBERA CHARACTER FALLS IN THE FOREST...

Well-dressed winos were out in full force at the Boston Harbor Hotel for the gala opening of the 17th annual Boston Wine Festival.

The evening started with a private cocktail reception at Meritage hosted by chef Daniel Bruce, followed by a free-for-all in the Wharf Room, where everyone sipped, nibbled and prattled on and on about vintages, varietals and other high-falutin' terms relating to fortified grape juice.

Among the familiar faces in the crowd: TV Diner host and KISS108 personality Billy Costa and his smokingly sexy wife, Lisa, rakish news anchor Jeff Glor of Channel 7 with his unbelievably hot other half, Nicole, connoisseurs Richard Rocha and Shira Werb, NECN babe Kristy Lee and her husband, Jason (a commercial–real estate developer), the scintillating Cynthia Frederick, Bling dealer Raman Handa of Alpha-Omega, Italo-über-hunk Andrea Luca Rossi, and handsome wine smoothie T.J. Douglas, to name a few.

Not that all the talk revolved around wine. In fact, there was a group of 30-somethings involved in a deep philosophical conversation about the Great Kazoo from The Flintstones.

"Why did he need a helmet?" wondered one otherwise intelligent professional, prompting another to mumble, "A $100,000 education, and here I am, talking about a little green cartoon character."

FEELIN' HOT, HOT, HOT...

In keeping with the actual weather pattern, Azure at the Lennox Hotel hosted We're Havin' a Heat Wave, a tropically themed fund-raiser for Community Servings.

The cocktails, food, music and conversation were all appropriately steamy, and it was a bit like a night in South Beach with such recognizable faces as clothes horse/restaurateur Gary Sullivan, the impossibly handsome Ty Dowell, Mittel-European nonprofit babe Monika Montroymowicz, adorable pair David Beshara and Rich Merritt, tie designer and tannest man alive Tony Corey, dearly beloved detective writer Robert B. Parker and the ridiculously chic Joan, interior designer to the stars Eileen Patterson, and one man who was asked if he'd tried the cheesecake martini and snapped, "Cheesecake is a dessert. It doesn't belong in a martini glass."

Among the amusing exchanges overheard:

One man who tied his shoe without looking said, "I can do this in the dark," to which another man responded, "I know. You've done it in my bedroom." Also overheard, a waiter who asked "Do you have any trash?" to which a guest responded, "Yes, but I don't think he'll fit on that tray." IB

Now Celebrating Our 200th Year of Worldwide Scarcity.

In an era obsessed with production both mass and fast, our snail-pace distilling and blending methods are woefully archaic. For seven admittedly stubborn generations we've placed a much higher value on final quality than final quantity.

This is precisely why our rums have earned a rather cult-like following, not to mention numerous awards. It's also why we refuse to shortcut our methods in order to hasten the output. If this means you won't find a bottle of Gosling's on every shelf and bar, so it must be. Anything exceptional is worth a little extra effort. On both of our parts.

SMART STYLE

Want a wardrobe that you love? You've got to shop strategically, says our fashion editor, Samantha House.

That means more than just making a list of the stuff you need each season and budgeting for those things (new spring jacket, low heels, etc.). It means looking at magazines, trying things on and finding the styles you love most—the look you're looking for—and buying within those guidelines, House adds.

Filled with some of the most exciting styles, fabrics and colors that you'll see in local stores this season, our Spring Fashion Preview can help you get your strategy in place so you'll be ready the moment the warm weather hits. With classic styles and neutral colors holding strong, it's a good year to buy basics that will anchor your wardrobe for years to come.

WHO SAYS DATING ENDS AT 40?

I couldn't help but notice that there wasn't one over-50 bachelor or bachelorette in the magazine this year (Feb. 8). Do you mean to tell me that there isn't one decent single over 50 in Boston? Or does the IMPROPER only cater to the young, and those of us who enjoy reading the magazine after 40 are considered too old? Maybe next year you'll do an article on the "Old and Single in Boston."

IVY CREEPS UP

I was excited to see that Limbo reopened as the new restaurant Ivy (The Word, Jan. 25), so I went there the day after I read about it in the IMPROPER. Although the food was good, the prices were up to double what was listed in the article: The "butcher block" appetizer was $10 instead of $5, and the ravioli was $12 instead of $9. It's crummy that they decided to change their prices right after they got the write-up.

ANOTHER 'BURB BLURB

I love reading your magazine and especially enjoyed the focus on the North Shore (Dec. 21). Give Salem about another year, and you'll want to include us in your next North Shore visit.

MISGUIDED

As metro Boston's "guide," you'd live up to your claim even more if your dance club listings were up to date. In the Feb. 8 issue, I see listings for Opal Lounge, Level and the Sugar Shack—but they're all closed! Please connect me to what's new.

NEW IN TOWN

All in the Family

What's black and white and looks like the lovechild of Davio's and Stella? Sorellina, the newest restaurant from the powerhouse partners behind Mistral and Teatro. With the ultra-stylish Italian restaurant Sorellina, Paul Roiff and his crew unleash a crack culinary team: executive chef/partner John Delpha, chef/owner Jamie Mammano (chef at Mistral) and chef/partner Robert Jean (chef at Teatro). It's a lot of hype to live up to, but Sorellina exhibits the same qualities that have made Mistral and Teatro such hits.

The swish space (formerly Salamander) was designed by Susan Orpin and Celeste Cooper, the restaurateurs' go-to design girl. (She also did Mistral, Teatro, XV Beacon and the Federalist.) Her clean, dramatic style shines through in Sorellina's striking, high-contrast décor: All 125 seats are crisp white, matching the all-white dinnerware and big, white ceiling panels, while the walls are jet black.

Like the décor, Sorellina's food is anything but boring. Waiters, dressed to complement the color scheme, bring warm chiavata bread with Vermont butter to your table to get things started. The menu is divided into a few categories: primo (starters like the fonduta, a sharp-cheese fondue, $14); pasta (dishes like macheroncelli, five-inch long macaroni tossed in butter sauce with American kobe beef meat balls and thin slices of pecorino toscano, come in small portions, $13, or large, $24); and secondi (like the chef's favorite, a monkfish prepared piccata style with Mediterranean vegetable ragout, $28). Contorni, or sides, include truffled fries with parmigiano ($11) and eggplant gratinata ($10), which are, like the entrées, big enough—and delicious enough—to justify the prices.

Even though Sorellina is less boisterous than Mistral and the two offer totally different types of food, Sorellina still invites comparisons: Its name means "little sister" in Italian, and a giant black-and-white mural fuzzily depicts a French countryside landscape, both nods to Mistral. Other comparisons are food-driven, namely Sorellina's tuna. It's no secret that Mistral's tuna tartare has a loyal following. But it was a surprise to staffers that Sorellina's tuna (chopped raw, with mostarda aioli and chili vinegar, $18) divided tuna fans into team Mistral and team Sorellina in just weeks. "It's already become a huge tuna competition," GM Mark D'Alessandro laughs.

Dessert afficionados could soon be taking sides too, since it's Mistral's pastry chef, Shane Grey, who's whipping up Italian-inspired delicacies like limoncello-citrus tiramisu ($12) and mocha-meringue semifreddo doused with caramel ($9). 1 Huntington Ave., Boston (617-412-4600). www.sorellinaboston.com. —EG

Glenn Ordway

Glenn Ordway was the play-by-play announcer for the Celtics during their most recent glory days and is now the host of the "Big Show," the No. 1-rated show on WEEI 850 AM—which happens to be the top-rated sports-talk station in the country. On Feb. 28, Ordway and the rest of the "Big Show" crew head over to the TD Banknorth Garden for the annual Whiney Awards, a show honoring the year's best listener contributions to the show's daily Whiner Line segment. Proceeds benefit the Boston Bruins Foundation and Boston Celtics Shamrock Foundation.

Improper Bostonian: I'm setting the over/under on Sox wins this season at 91. What's your bet?

Glenn Ordway: I think the Sox will win less than 91 games. I just believe they have too many "ifs" this year to win deep into the 90s again.

IB: Same question for the Pats, but with 10.5 wins.

GO: Over. After watching what happened in this past Super Bowl, they'll be more motivated to win again. Plus, their basic team structure is still intact. I think they'll be a major factor.

IB: Who'll have the bigger impact this season: Johnny Damon with the Yankees or Josh Beckett with the Sox?

GO: Beckett, although I'm concerned about his health issues. Pitchers always have more impact on the game than everyday players.

IB: Who do you think brings home a title first: Celtics or Bruins?

GO: You mean in my lifetime?

IB: How many games would you last in the Cs' broadcast booth these days before going Donnie Moore on yourself?

GO: I'd go 82, provided they pay me for all 82.

IB: Who'd win a boxing match between Steve DeOssie and Fred Smerlas?

GO: I think the two would probably find a way to intellectually work out their differences in a serene manner with one great, endearing hug. You are, after all, talking about pacifists here.

IB: How about between Pete Sheppard and Rosie O'Donnell?

GO: They'd walk away as great friends. They have so much in common.

Small Is Beautiful

Sunday Snacks... With football season on hiatus until fall, Sundays have undoubtedly lost some of their luster. But on March 5, Vox Populi helps Sunday regain a little bit of its appeal, thanks to a new dining deal they've dubbed Small Plates and Small Prices. Each week, executive chef Eric Bogardus offers a menu of rotating small-plate specials paired with three signature drinks (a red sangria martini, a wine selection of the week and a champagne cocktail), for an average price of $5.95 per plate. The dishes can be unusual: crispy frog legs, squid tonnato or chicken lollipops, which are skewered pieces of grilled chicken, glazed with soy, ginger and honey. Hey, we can still get depressed about football being over, but at least we won't be hungry. 755 Boylston St., Boston (617-424-8300). www.voxboston.com.

Coolidge Corner's Cookin'... Fresh off a successful stint as executive chef at Hotel Commonwealth's Great Bay, and after temporarily keeping busy by launching 28 Degrees in the South End, chef Jeremy Sewall is ready for his next venture. In late February, Sewall and his wife, Lisa, are set to open Lineage (a reference to Sewall's family roots in Brookline) on Harvard Street in Coolidge Corner. The small, 75-seat restaurant, located at the old home of Lucy's, features a contemporary-American menu (which relies heavily on seafood) prepared by Sewall, as well as an extensive pastry menu created by Lisa, former pastry chef at L'Espalier. 242 Harvard St., Brookline.

Putting the D in JP... We all know Jamaica Plain as one of Boston's funkier neighborhoods. For that reason Douglas Organ, owner of the fine-dining eatery Arbor, decided to ditch the stuffy scenery and fancy fare and re-open as the hipper (and cheaper) Café D. The revamped restaurant, which opened Feb. 7, has a more relaxed atmosphere with big windows, communal tables, a take-out option and a new menu featuring dishes that top off at $20 each. 711 Centre St., Jamaica Plain (617-522-9500).

Salt-roasted beets, smoky eggplant caviar and whipped feta at Vox

High Five... We may not be allowed to enjoy Happy Hours here in the Hub (thanks, Puritan heritage!), but Cambridge's Bambara in the Hotel Marlow is offering a new afterwork deal that'll let you save your cash for cocktails by going frugal on food. Nightly from 4-6 pm, Bambara's bar menu features a new "Five Under Five" menu that includes items like a half-pound burger, steak frites and short-rib nachos for only $4.99 each. If you're still hungry, grab a side of truffle frites or onion rings for $3—and then splurge on a few more beers. 25 Edwin H. Land Blvd., Cambridge (617-868-4444). —RL

Bigger, Better

For Boston fashionistas, Barneys is a must-visit on trips to New York: The small Chestnut Hill locale can't hold a candle to the selection that the New York location carries. That's why Bostonians are thanking their lucky stars that Barneys is about to unveil a 45,000-square-foot mega-boutique in Copley Place, where the Loews theater once stood. The store opens officially on March 10 after a much-hyped opening party on March 9 that hordes of fashion-conscious Bostonians are trying to finagle a ticket to. From what I've heard, it's going to be harder to get into than the Louis Boston party during the Democratic National Convention. If you do manage to score an invite, you'll be among the first to see the 4,000-square-foot shoe section, in-house concierge, a personal shopper, "smelling columns" in the fragrance area and top-notch items by Derek Lam, Givenchy, Lanvin, Narcisco Rodriguez and Rochas, among others. Shopping in this town will never be the same. Copley Place (617-385-3300). —Samantha House

Golf Indoors

If you believe Punxsu-awney Phil, you won't be on the golf course any-time soon. But just be-cause it's frigid outside doesn't mean your handi-cap has to suffer. Take a swing at one of these in-door courses.

Big Sticks Golf Academy
26 Ray Ave., Burlington
(781-229-2269)
www.bigsticksgolf.com

The 3,000-square-foot facility includes nine stations where you can practice your swing for $15 per hour. If you're looking to improve your game, you can use the video analysis system, which videotapes each swing to give you instant feedback. The AboutGolf virtual reality simulator allows you to play at virtual 18-hole locations around the world for $50 per hour.

Boston Golf Academy
200 Stuart St., Boston (617-457-2699)
www.bostongolfacademy.com

Located in the Radisson hotel, the academy offers private lessons by professional instructors for $45 per half hour or four lessons for $160. Each lesson includes a computerized video analysis with frame-by-frame and double-angle features. You can rent a bucket of balls for about $10 for use on the 250-foot putting green. No membership is required, and there's free two-hour parking in the hotel garage.

CityGolf Boston
38 Bromfield St., Boston (617-357-4653)
100 Federal St., Boston (617-204-9797)
www.citygolfboston.com

Eight practice areas let you hit 65 golf balls for a flat $10 on a 280-square-foot green. Also, PGA professionals offer lessons that incorporate Dartfish Swing Analysis, which videotapes your swing and uploads the video to the Web, for $60 per half hour.

Golf Country
Route 114, Middleton (978-774-4476)
www.golfcountry114.com

Open year-round, Golf Country offers winter golfers heated and covered areas for $5-$10, depending on how many balls you want to hit.

Paradise Golf Driving Range
25 Lonergan Road, Middleton (978-750-4653)
www.paradisefamilygolf.com

Paradise lets you hit from any of 12 covered stations: $5 for a small bucket of balls, $7 for a medium and $10 for a big one. Professional instructors are available for both private and group lessons. Private lessons cost $50 per half hour; group rates range from $50- $135, depending on the size of the group.

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

Jumpin' Julep... In just over a year, they built a loyal clientele at their Coolidge Corner clothing store; now the owners of Mint Julep want to make a mark on the other side of the Charles. Sensing that the area lacked a "small, friendly boutique," Brooke Garber and Stephanie Nist have turned a Harvard Square candy store into a cozy showroom of Méli-Mélo denim, White + Warren sweaters and Tibi dresses—plus reasonably priced handbags and accessories for Cambridge's stylish set.

Belly up to Art... Artist and former professional belly dancer Donna Agnew keeps on branching out. She owned Adonna Dance Studio in Harvard Square 15 years ago, worked with the Wentworth Galleries in Florida and then opened the New Art Gallery in the North End. Her latest endeavor, the Artmosphere Gallery, is a bigger incarnation of New Art. In it Agnew hopes to support local artists (both new and known) whose work she describes as "whimsical." She'll also bring a touch of fun to the fine art scene, hosting themed receptions on the last Saturday of each month: A belly dancer graced the gallery's opening party, and her Feb. 25 themed event will be Art of the Geisha, to complement her Japanese-inspired pieces. "I may be 60, but I still can have fun," Agnew says. 28½ Prince St., Boston (617-742-2700).

Seeing Stars Again... For those who've been peeping through the windows of Cambridge's boarded-up Plough and Stars looking for signs of life, the wait is over. The 37-year-old bar, which closed last June, is set to reopen at the beginning of March. Co-owners Brendan Curtis, Tim Carey and Jennifer Lockwood have been renovating to create a space that's simply "rejuvenated," according to Curtis. Expect to see more local bands, a new menu with "pub-bistro" fare and daily specials created by Curtis and Jim Seery, in addition to the newly decorated space. Weekly bluegrass nights are on the agenda for Sundays, as well as regular televised games of English football (read: soccer) on Saturdays. 912 Mass. Ave., Boston (617-576-0032).

Laugh Riots... Boston-based comedian Andy Ofiesh lays himself bare, literally, for his audience. Ofiesh, who heads up the Naked Comedy Showcase held at 10 pm on the first Wednesday of each month at Improv Boston, goes on stage stark naked and jokes about his nudity. He's been performing naked for three years, but has only recently recruited other comedians to disrobe with him for his public comedy night, which is scheduled to run through May. Although his mom wishes he were famous for something she could tell her neighbors, his audiences haven't been complaining.

TRUTH ACHE

If you want to read my book, you can get it at the lie-brary.

As you may have heard, Oprah recently laid a public beatdown on James Frey, author of A Million Little Pieces. It turns out the Oprah's Book Club author took a few liberties with the truth in his "memoirs" of drug addiction. Did he really get a root canal with no anesthesia? Did he in fact go to jail? How much crack would a woodchuck smoke if a woodchuck could smoke crack? It's all academic at this point, because Frey's sold more than 3 million books, and last I heard he wasn't giving any refunds.

In light of this whole Frey debacle, I feel it's time for me to come clean on my own forthcoming addict-lit autobiography, tentatively titled A Billion Tiny Fragments. If Oprah would like to chastise me, she should know that I've been very dishonest and I deserve to be punched in the testicles on her show (it would be nice if she'd mention my book a couple of times, too). If anything, I think this whole ugly situation just reinforces my point that I'm a Bad Boy and a Pretentious Writer who's prone to capitalizing Random Words, as if I were someone writing a Pamphlet arguing for Rebellion against the Tyrannical Monarchy in the Year 1774. Anyway, in the name of setting the record straight, here are the sections where, in retrospect, I may have exaggerated my story:

My mother was not abducted by the Taliban and forced to live in a cave in Tora Bora and crochet burqas. Actually, she went on a cruise to Bora Bora. And it was very pleasant.

On one point I will not budge: The chapter where I smoked rat poison and crashed my car into the Mass General maternity wing is definitely based on real-life events. I actually had two glasses of Chardonnay and went to a Livingston Taylor concert.

In Chapter 8, "Selling My Organs in Tijuana," I wrote that I once smoked so much crack that my body was 50 percent crack, and the other junkies would eat my fingernails and overdose. Actually, I had a crack in my driveway, so I bought some Thompson's Water Seal. I'm hoping that'll take care of it.

About the story where I was crawling down I-95 huffing the freshly painted lane stripes and got hit by an 18-wheeler and died… I did eat some glue as a child.

Experts have said that the chapter of the book detailing my medical experiences couldn't have happened, because it would be impossible for one man to use a rib-spreader on himself and then perform his own open-heart surgery after the doctor dies of an incredibly ironic heart attack at the beginning of the procedure. I wish I could say what really happened, but after the procedure I was so jonesing for a cigarette that I smoked all the hospital documents pertaining to my operation. And my memory of the operation itself is fuzzy. Was it heart surgery or an ingrown toenail? I'll let the haters split hairs.

Addiction experts have questioned the following passage, claiming that it's impossible to become physically addicted to clothing:

"My personality is so addictive that everything is a potential addiction for me. I can't even wear socks anymore, because I started to get addicted to socks and wear them in totally inappropriate situations, such as with sandals and while water-skiing. Then my family was like: 'Ez, you need to admit to yourself that socks rule your life. Stop the lies.' Now I get blisters and my feet are often cold, but I know it has to be this way."

"NOW THAT I THINK ABOUT IT, I'M ADDICTED TO SEX, NOT SOCKS."

You know, that's inaccurate. Now that I think about it, I'm addicted to sex, not socks. You can see how that would get confusing, particularly if you like to have sex with socks. Not that I do that, unless you find it dark and perverted and titillating, in which case: Yes, day and night, tube socks, ankle socks and sock monkeys.

Now, about the part where I injected diesel fuel into my femoral artery and then blacked out and went rock-climbing and had a boulder trap my arm so I had to cut it off to escape: The haters have pointed out that my two fully functional arms prove this is a lie. I say, Back off. Were you there? Were you? No. So who's to say what actually happened? There are two people who know what really happened that day, and one of them is a grizzly bear. And he's not talking, because I killed him with my bare hands—I mean, hand. IB

Diggin' Dino Radja

A sad look at the state of the Celtics

Remember Dino Radja? You remember good old Dino, don't you? Just in case, let me refresh your memory.

Radja played for the Celtics from 1993-97 and was your typical European baller. Standing 6'11", he wasn't much of an inside presence, but was automatic from the foul line extended and rocked a soft Croatian touch.

He also happened to bear a strong resemblance to Al Bundy—and I'm talking shoe salesman Al Bundy, not four-touchdowns-in-a-game-at-Polk-High Al Bundy—which, when you're playing in the NBA, puts you in pretty selective company.

Over his three-plus seasons in Boston, Dino averaged about 17 points and 8.5 rebounds. During the '95-'96 campaign, he averaged 20 and 10. Not too shabby.

Why does this matter? Mostly it doesn't, except that it helps me prove a point about the Celtics, which should, in turn, prove pretty disturbing to the 45 or so serious fans they have left (and that includes me):

Outside of Antoine Walker and Paul Pierce, Dino Radja—a relative no-name with a four year career—has been the most productive player to wear Celtic Green since the end of the 1992-93 season.

Don't believe me? Look it up. We're talking about 13 NBA seasons, and only two Celtics have been able to match the output of the mighty Dino Radja.

Man, what happened to this franchise?

It's not like we haven't had a shot at top-notch talent; after all, the C's drafted Chauncey Billups and Joe Johnson, currently two of the NBA's best. The only problem is that we gave up on Billups after 51 games, and Johnson was sent packing after 48.

And although it's easy to second-guess draft picks 10 years after the fact, it's hard to stare at drafts featuring names like Acie Earl, Eric Montross, Kedrick Brown and Joe Forte, knowing that Sam Cassell, Eddie Jones, Richard Jefferson, Zach Randolph, Tony Parker and Gilbert Arenas could've been drafted instead.

But regardless of the reasons for the Celtics' ineptitude, here's the main point: It's been almost 15 years since they've put a legitimate product on the court, and with each passing season, it becomes harder and harder to root for the Celtics.

Sure, there was the run to the Eastern Conference Finals in 2002, but that was a fluke. They never had a shot at winning the title that season.

And don't forget that the only reason the Celtics made it that far was a mid-season trade for Rodney Rogers and Tony Delk—the deal that cost us Joe Johnson.

Then came the Danny Ainge era.

He tried to convince us Vin Baker could be rehabilitated; that Raef LaFrentz, his huge contract and his pair of 80-year-old knees could be an asset. He got rid of Antoine, traded away Rogers and Eric Williams—he even broke the bank on a halfway retarded Mark Blount.

It was all part of his divine plan, and to say that the results have been mixed is to be generous on a Mother Teresian level.

Are the Celtics any better than they were in 2001? Not even close.

More importantly, does the future really look that bright? Honestly, I'm still not sure.

I know rebuilding takes time, but why do I feel like the rebuilding hasn't even begun?

The young foundation is there.

I believe Al Jefferson has the makings of a star, and many legitimate NBA scouts think Gerald Green could be the next T-Mac, which is great.

But don't we need to see Big Al go a month without severely spraining his right ankle before assuming he can carry the load of an entire franchise?

> I KNOW REBUILDING TAKES TIME, BUT WHY DO I FEEL LIKE THE REBUILDING HASN'T EVEN BEGUN?

And let's not forget that it took McGrady two full seasons to get comfortable in the pros; it took Jermaine O'Neal four. In both cases, they were on different teams by the time they became stars. Can we even be sure that Green will want to stay up here in freezing-cold Boston after three seasons?

When are we going to see the front office tire of being mediocre?

When are they going to give Green and Jefferson 30 minutes a game to see if they have what it takes?

Hopefully it's soon, but until then, look for me at the Garden. I'll be the idiot streaking across the court with "Bring Back Dino" painted all over my body. IB

THE DANCE

Spring Fashion: Flashdance

Behind the scenes in the rag business

One of the legends of the stock market is that prices tend to rise as skirt hems go up. The New York Times a few weeks ago featured a winter trend: short skirts and boots. I'm praying for the same trend in the spring. For stock market reasons of course.

Funny to have an issue about spring fashion as we're locked into New England winter, but that's the "rag business" as it's called. Each season, the stores are already ordering for the next one and planning for the one after that. I grew up listening to people in the rag business, sarcastically called "garmentos" or "cloakies." My grandfather, who grew up in the old West End before it got plowed under, was a garmento himself. He made maternity underwear, mostly slips, and used to take me to his factory on Harrison Avenue, in what is now Chinatown. He'd put me up on a high stool at his designing table and tell me to "make something pretty." Since I didn't know at the time where babies came from, or indeed, what made them, I suppose I flunked maternity design. My crude drawings of baseball bats and smoke coming out of chimneys, upon reflection, were pretty Freudian; maybe I should have stuck to it, been in a real business.

My uncle Howard went into maternity fashions as well; he was the first to make sportswear like jeans with elastic panels for the tummy (a technical term). He created a motto for the business: "You knock 'em; we frock 'em." My uncle was an unconventional man, in the habit of doing outrageous things which he found to be eminently practical. For instance, one summer, Howard was driving home from his factory in Allston wearing a seersucker suit. Noticing that the pants were all wrinkled, he went directly to the neighborhood dry cleaners, where he took off his pants, left them to be pressed and walked the several blocks back to his parked car in jacket, tie and boxer shorts.

Uncle Howard was also an amateur physician. He'd attended medical school for two years but left to go into maternity fashion, mostly because it was so unexpected. He'd still field medical questions wherever he went, though, and people sought him out to ask for help.

"I've got a pain in the left side of my belly," I've heard him being asked. "What do you think?"

At the theater once with Howard, we went to the men's room between acts. Guys were lined up first to use the urinals, then to wash their hands. Howard shook his head in exasperation, cupped his hands and announced to the crowded room, "Don't you idiots know that urine is one of the purest substances? You should be washing your hands before you pee, not after."

"All businesses are the same," he used to tell me. "So much of life's an accident: what teacher inspired you in high school; who walks into the room at the right time or wrong time and changes your life. You can ask anyone you know if they had any idea where they'd be today when they graduated college. The rag business is basic, goes back thousands of years. A dress is a cloth garment with three holes: two for the arms, one for the head. Change in fashion is an illusion; it's all been seen before. I just keep my eyes out on sticks and remember to dress British, think Yiddish."

I checked all this out with my friend Wendy, the fashion maven, who laughed and said, "True, but we have to adorn ourselves and move out onto the stage; attract others with our finery, move on."

"So what about spring?"

"Theater of the absurd, of course. Themes are big over small, and small over big: big sweaters over slim pants, or tight tops over paper-bag pants or balloon skirts." Wendy was on a roll. "Dresses are huge this spring, the biggest in a long time. They can be long or short, nothing in between: Extremes are everything. Necklaces are dead, but bracelets are alive, as are chandelier earrings—and it's all about gold. Black is still the color, but you can also go with natural fibers and organic colors: putty, cream or white. And the greatest trend: The '80s are back. It's Flashdance, baby, but you've got to add designer shades: Dior and Chanel, with the labels on the side."

People who are great at what they do transmit their excitement to others. Wendy the fashion maven almost makes me want to get out on the floor and sing "What a Feeling"—in my stacked heels, of course, which will also be big this spring. IB

ANTHONY EVERETT

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Anthony Everett, Chronicle co-host and co-anchor of Channel 5's 5 and 5:30 pm newscasts, was born and raised in Manhattan and attended Trinity High School before graduating from Tufts University. He began his broadcasting career at KSPN in Aspen, Colo., in 1984 as a sports reporter and anchor, eventually becoming an award-winning news director and anchor. He came to Channel 5 as a general-assignment reporter in 1990 and served as co-anchor of the 6 and 11 pm weekend newscasts, as well as the weekend edition of the midday newscast, before being named co-anchor of NewsCenter 5's early-evening broadcasts in 2000. He joined Chronicle last September, replacing Peter Mehegan. In addition to his on-set duties, Everett serves as senior correspondent for major national events and breaking news, contributing special reports that have won the station National Headliner Awards. He's received numerous Emmy nominations, and in 2000 he shared the Best Newscast award from the Massachusetts/Rhode Island Associated Press Broadcasters competition and was named Boston's Best Newscaster by THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN. He also won the 1996 National Headliner Award and Massachusetts Broadcasters Association First Place for spot news coverage. A longtime advocate and volunteer for the National Multiple Sclerosis Society, he was honored with its Public Education Award in 1992. He lives on the South Shore with his wife and their two children.

Jonathan Soroff: Are you the hottest man in local television?

Anthony Everett: No. I wouldn't say so.

JS: Then who is?

AE: I haven't given it much thought. It's never really interested me. There are people who are on TV because they want to be on TV and there are people who are on TV because they're journalists who ... ded up telling their stories through this medium, and I'm the latter.

JS: Does the Chronicle gig allow you to show more of your sparkling personality?

AE: Absolutely. You'll see me doing things I like to do.

JS: You gonna get naked?

AE: [Laughs.] Close to it, actually. We just got back from Barbados, and I at least got into a bathing suit. But we'll be doing things that are participatory, like skiing or sailing, which I love to do, or swimming with the sea turtles in Barbados.

JS: Speaking of skiing, there's this suspicious part of your CV where you were a reporter in Aspen. What did that entail: 12 to 15 runs and then sunning yourself at Bonnie's?

> "IN THIS BUSINESS, WE ALL FIND WAYS TO DIVORCE OUR EMOTIONS FROM THE CONTENT OF THE STORY."

AE: [Laughs.] I worked for a year in Aspen for the woman who owned the station, and then her daughter came to work there. We met at the company Christmas party, and she subsequently became my wife. So I met my mother-in-law before I met my wife.

JS: Biggest story you ever covered?

AE: That's tough. I think for the sheer magnitude, probably the Rhode Island nightclub fire.

JS: Stupidest story you ever had to report?

AE: [Laughs.] As an anchor, you have to do a lot of silly things, but here's one. Visuals drive television, obviously, and there was a smash 'n' grab in Kansas City. A pickup truck backed into a 7-11 and stole the ATM, and the last line of the story was, "Police are asking your help in finding whoever might have done this." So when the camera came back to me, I said, "So if you happened to be in Kansas City last night and know who these guys are, please call the authorities." Sometimes I wonder why it's important to do that kind of news on our broadcast.

JS: Ever have a hard time disguising your emotions?

AE: After the birth of my children, stories with children as victims became very difficult for me. Those are tough.

JS: So how do you hide the tears, or disgust, or anger?

AE: In this business, I think we all find ways to divorce our emotions from the content of the story. One way, as you're well aware, is through the gallows humor in the newsroom, and another is by appreciating what I have in my own life—my wife, my family. That grounds me.

JS: What about sneezing or laughing?

AE: Those things happen. I remember one night when we took a lightning strike and the whole studio went dark. When we came back on the air, I was reading a story about the Pope granting an audience to whores who had reformed their lives. Out of the corner of my eye, all I can see is my co-anchor's back shaking, so of course, I start laughing, and you're not supposed to laugh at Pope stories, so I finally just said, "Y'know, folks, we have no lights in the studio which makes it really hard to read, so we're going to take a commercial break," and that's what we did.

JS: Of the big guys who signed off last year—Brokaw, Jennings, Koppel—who do you miss the most?

AE: Jennings. I always tried to pattern myself a little after him. I liked his sophistication, his worldliness.

JS: Last thing you bought from TV?

AE: Never done it.

JS: What?! You need to start giving back, Anthony.

AE: Oh, wait. When the Patriots first won the Super Bowl, I got sucked into that Sports Illustrated offer where you got a book, a commemorative football and the subscription.

JS: Dream assignment?

AE: A London bureau posting for at least a year.

JS: News item you'd most like to announce?

AE: Peace in the Middle East comes to mind, but that sounds like a Miss America answer, so I'll say a breakthrough in cold fusion that reduces our need for foreign oil.

JS: Funniest on-air mistake?

AE: I once, even though I'd been there many times, mispronounced La Jolla, Calif., as "La Ja-la." That was painful.

JS: Is there one word that trips you up whenever you see it on the teleprompter?

AE: For some reason, the word "rural."

JS: If you could interview anyone alive, who would it be and why?

AE: Fidel Castro, because he's held on down there for so long, and when he goes, Cuba's going to be a very interesting place.

JS: OK, is Mary Richardson like Donna Reed on Prozac, or what?

AE: [Laughs.] I don't think she needs the Prozac. She's just tremendous.

JS: One of the most eminently likable humans ever.

AE: Quote me as saying, "ditto." There's nothing not to like about Mary.

JS: Agreed. So how hard is it to fill Peter Mehegan's shoes?

AE: There's no replacing him. There's simply trying to do the job as well as I can and carry on a tradition that he established.

JS: He was known as a car guy. What hobby will you be known for?

AE: I'm a boat guy. I have a 30-foot racing sailboat, and that's my thing. That and skiing.

JS: Ed Harding burns the candle at both ends. Is he main-lining Red Bull?

AE: It's an insane schedule. I don't know what he's taking, but he's clearly not sharing with the rest of the class.

JS: Last question—finish this rhyme: Roses are Red, Violets are Blue, Anthony Everett's a reporter...

AE: ...who's working for you. IB

s you pack away your fall and winter clothes and hit the stores for updates to your spring wardrobe, you may experience some déjà vu. There are more than a few similarities between what was and what will be. The main likeness is that spring styles remain sophisticated while showcasing the restrained colors so popular this fall and winter. In other words, you won't find any fluorescent crop-tops or spandex minis on the racks at Saks Fifth Avenue anytime soon. What you'll find are elegant yet sexy interpretations of the following hot looks for spring:

While black is still going strong, the colors of the moment are much subtler: pale pink, peach, nude and tan. You'll find these ultrafeminine hues in every silhouette and in every shop this season, but most prefer it in a simple cut that evokes the feeling of innocence like the DKNY dress on this page.

The tulip skirt trend showed up in the fall, but it really picks up steam for the warmer months. Large pleats that begin at the waistband and taper to a straight hem can be found in any fabric from cotton to gold lamé. One of my favorites is the one by Chloé on page 23. This skirt can be dressed down or up with a white cotton tank or a gold silk chemise and is particularly flattering on women with small waists and larger hips.

Metallic fabrics are sticking around, but look for them in much subtler shades. They're more about sheen than flashy shine, and this subdued take makes it much easier to mix and match them with colors already existing in your wardrobe.

If you're yearning for some bold color after the sea of black we've braved this fall and winter, opt for a graceful print. The trend moves away from smaller, repeating patterns and toward larger prints or splashes of color like the dress by Y Yigal on page 26.

Almost every look for spring will favor a cinched waist. Whether the garment is designed with a wider waistband or simply gathered with a belt, this is the No. 1 look for the season. Long shirts wrapped with ribbon and worn over thin skirts, or gathered dresses with a thick belt like the BCBG number on this issue's cover, are all you need to add excitement to your closet.

Black is still the color of choice for the evening, and soon you'll even find it in lighter fabrics to be worn during the day—from one-piece jumpers to shorts and sheer blouses. At the end of the day, a simply beautiful little black dress is your best bet as a staple for the season and will go a long way for warm nights.

Last year Bermuda shorts were a big hit, and while they're still around, the emphasis has shifted to rolled or cuffed short shorts. Team them with button-downs or even light jackets to dress them up a bit. You may be shocked to see them show up as suits in the summer months.

Stripes in red, white, blue, khaki and tan, worn with solids of the like, are on fire this year. Sailor pants and skirts as well as boatneck collars look playful and upper-crusty. You can't go wrong with nostalgic and clean sailor-inspired wear like the Ralph Lauren pick on this page. This theme transitions seamlessly from lounging around the house to a night on the town.

This season's heels are as high as can be, but chunkier and more practical. Look for stacked, block heels, a couple of inches wide, as well as more delicate versions that taper. You'll find these heels on everything from thin-as-can-be strappy sandals to the fuller-coverage peep-toed shoes.

What to stow away this year? Bell bottoms or flares (the seasons ahead prefer a straighter or a really wide pant leg), and anything that's boho chic. Look more to the glamorous movie star shapes from the '50s and '60s to form a lasting style. All in all, the most important thing to remember is to mix and match with the items you currently own: Add a few key things that you fall in love with this season, and you'll have a fabulous wardrobe that'll last. fection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Subtle texture and muted colors are the name of the game for menswear this season.

While suits still reign for work attire, casualwear is playful and experimental for men this season. Patterns are everywhere and a little more whimsical than they've been in the past, with simple, abstract graphics that look great with almost anything. Avoid shirts and tees with words on them. Instead, go for images that are blown up or simplified in some way. Colors like navy and salmon are big hits, and they pair well with neutral shades like tan, white and brown. Try matching a navy, printed T-shirt with a pair of white drawstring dress pants, for example, for either daytime or evening.

Nostalgia also plays a big part in menswear this season. Braided belts and old-school classics like khakis and long-board shorts are making a comeback, but men's fashion has gone a bit tongue in cheek: It's a throwback to the more proper days of our fathers, but with a modern, fun spin. Preppy looks like Nantucket belts and pants are abundant, but they gain an edge when skulls and crossbones replace the traditional little whales. You'll also find basic blazers amped up with stripes down the sides or a graphic on the back. Pair one with a basic knit, your favorite pair of jeans and Sperrys for another version of old-money chic.

If you're venturing into re-creating your wardrobe, start small with interesting tees or perhaps a pair of seersucker pants, and work your way up to the big things like white pants and funky blazers. Remember: It only looks good if you feel comfortable in it. If you feel like you need help, just enlist an employee of your favorite local store. Or do what we did in these pages and pick a favorite designer. (We opted for U.S.-based up-and-comer Modern Amusement.) Most design houses create pieces that work well with others in the same collection, and you can always go online to see how they pair items in new and funky ways.

A MAN IN UNIFORM

BY SAMANTHA HOUSE

You'd never guess that Uniform, the chic South End men's boutique, opened just 10 months ago. Spend a few moments in the store, and you'll see repeat customers who clearly adore both the shop and its owner, Gary Ritacco. "I wanted the store to be an extension of my personality: cool but easy-going," he says. A second goal was an easy-going price point. "I won't buy anything too expensive," Ritacco adds. "It's possible to find affordable clothes for men that are both original and well-made."

Ritacco definitely has his own style. "I love retro and laid-back fashions, the kind my dad used to wear in the '40s and '50s," he says. "My dad was always really stylish and had such a cool way of dressing—sort of golf-inspired, too. Penguin and Ben Sherman have that feeling." When searching the country for his merchandise, Ritacco says he goes with his gut feeling. "When I'm buying merchandise for my shop, I want it to be really hip but not over the top. When I see something, I just know instantly that it's right." More often than not, you can't find similar merchandise on anyone else's racks in Boston. Ritacco sticks to lesser known but equally hip American and British designers like Merc and Gola. He also ends up with larger lines asking him to carry their specialty labels.

Along with style and price, Ritacco pays attention to wearablility. "I'm always concerned with looking age-appropriate. I want to have fun with my clothes, but I don't want to look ridiculous. I think most of the men in the city feel this way, and that's why my store has been so well received. Uniform stocks basics as well as more funky pieces, so people can mix and match according to the way they're feeling on any particular day."

4. Orange knit top by LaRok, $178; black high-waisted pants by Felix, $245; gold wedges by Kors Michael Kors, $180. All at Intermix. Gold and leopard-skin agate necklace, $189; gold and striped agate cross necklace, $178. Both by Adriana Jenkins for Sterling Jones at Gretta Luxe.

Though it'll probably take a few years for the dreaded low-low-waisted pants to completely disappear, hope is on the horizon. Many designers are already re-introducing pants with higher waists into their repertoire this season. You'll see them first in the form of sailor pants; soon after they'll appear in dress pants, and lastly in denim. Don't think of the '80s and '90s versions, though; these are tighter through the waist and hip, making them form-fitting and super sexy. Keep your eyes open and you'll see these gems begin their comeback this spring!

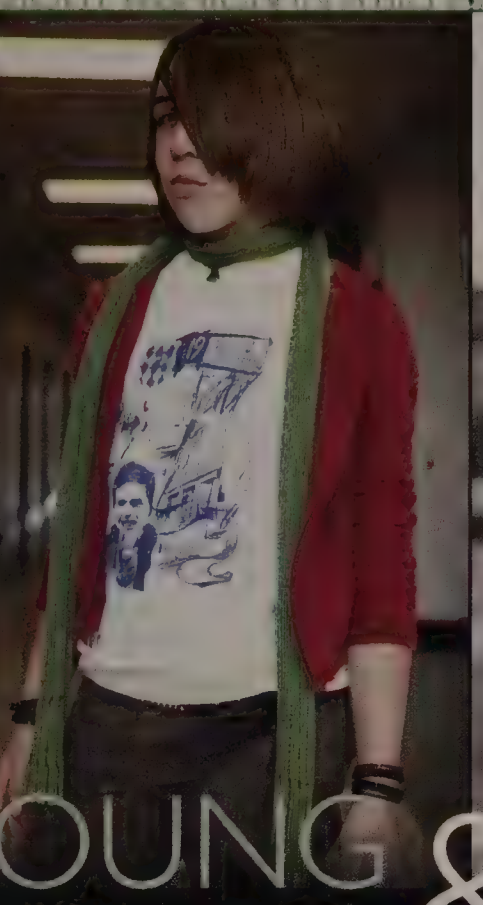
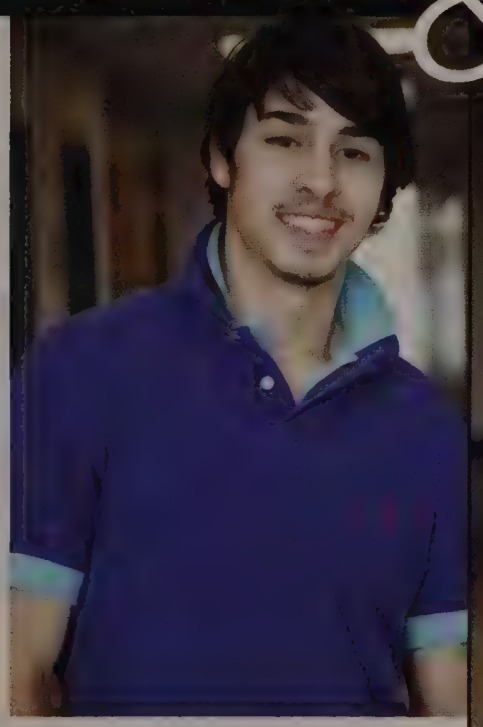
TEENS TODAY CARE ABOUT FASHION IN A BIG WAY—AND THEY'RE NOT AFRAID TO STAND OUT.

THE YOUNG & THE TRENDY





BY LESLIE HUDSON PHOTOGRAPHS BY KEVIN KEITH

ant to know what the next big fashion trends will be? The stuff that real people will be wearing? Check out your local high school. Yup, if you grew up in the conformist days of jeans and tees, it may come as a surprise to hear that today's teens are the one to watch when it comes to fashion trends. Originality, independence and self-assurance are common themes in teens' daily lives, and it shows in the clothes they're choosing to wear. They've raised the bar in self-expression and are now leaders in making or breaking current trends.

"It's a time in life to experiment," says Seventeen magazine's fashion director, Gina Kelly. "They're not afraid to put themselves out there and change their look from day to day. It's social currency for them to look good at school, and it helps their self-esteem."

Local teens that we talked to at Chelsea High School offer a more prosaic explanation for their sophisticated styles. "We've got time to spend when it comes to fashion and looking for clothes. Adults don't," says senior Nicole Belanger. She asserts that planning outfits, keeping up with fashion trends and maintaining an identity are top priorities for her and her friends. But she's proud of the fact that kids at Chelsea High don't rely on cliques to figure out self-image and style.

"We're not about stereotypes here," Belanger maintains. "We dress the way we want—to match our personalities. Different personalities can fit together; so can people with totally different styles." (That's a good thing at Chelsea; with more than 30 different countries represented in its population of 1,600 students, it's one of the most diverse schools in the area.) But though they end up with different results, today's teens start out with the same basic material—the latest fashions.

"[They're] up on what's stylish not long after things hit the runway," Seventeen's Kelly says. "This wasn't the case 10 years ago."

Chelsea senior Anosha Hassan is a case in point. Keeping up with fashion trends almost daily, she reads InStyle, Seventeen and Vogue, goes to the mall regularly and tries to incorporate celebrity fashion trends into her own style. Covered from head to toe in clothing seen in all the latest fashion spreads—chandelier crystal earrings, layered emblem T-shirts, designer jeans—she says that creating a current look is most important to her.

"People here notice when you stand out or that you've got style, and if you're ahead of trends," she says. "I want to wear things I see in magazines, but at the same time be unique." Hassan and her family moved to Boston four years ago from Pakistan, where girls her age usually don't have as much freedom in their wardrobe choices. "I get ideas for what to wear from both Hollywood and Bollywood," she says. "Mixing American styles with the styles from my own culture shows who I really am."

Along with the Internet and magazines to pore over for the latest looks, teens now have an abundance of stores (H&M, Forever 21, Wet Seal, Aéropostale) that cater to their age group and their desire for the most current looks at reasonable prices. Chelsea senior Beheshta Gohari, originally from Afghanistan, moved here when she was 14. It didn't take long for her to catch on to American trends and create her own style. "I spend an hour each morning just deciding what to wear," she says. "I might try on five or six outfits before I leave my house."

Like many teens her age, Gohari works part-time to support her shopping habits. (Earning about $800 a month processing film at a photo lab, she spends most of her paycheck on her wardrobe.) Last year, teen spending in the U.S. reached $170 billion and has increased an average of 5 percent per year over the past seven years. But even though they spend a lot, most teens know how to stretch a dollar. "They're definitely designer-conscious, because their favorite celebrities are," says Seventeen's Kelly. "But because of economics, they have to be more creative when spending money on clothes and accessories."

That's why, according to Kelly, most of the items featured in Seventeen cost $100 or less. She says teens often start small when it comes to designer brands—a Coach clutch, a Louis Vuitton wallet, designer costume jewelry—and then build a wardrobe from there. But brand names aren't what stylish teens necessarily look for when adding pieces to their wardrobe. They say it's about being comfortable, while also making a statement.

"I get fashion," says junior Mariel Soto. "And that doesn't mean I have to spend a lot to be in style. If something fits well, has clean lines and is well-made, where it comes from doesn't matter."

"It's all about being original around here," adds senior John Ruelas. "Everybody wants to feel like their own person, no matter how much they're able to spend on clothes. It's not always about what brand you're wearing; it's about how confident you look."

Kelly says that with all their access to "what's hot," teens still tend to dress based on their daily emotions (something she thinks adults don't do as much), and that's what keeps them dressing creatively. And although self-expression's important, teens do care about trends in a big way; what's in one week at school may be out the next. "I have a whole closet of ponchos from last year," Soto says, "and I don't know what to do with them." Laughing, the other students share some of their retired wardrobe pieces, including last summer's trend of airbrushed T-shirts, a flashback to 1980, now "so out."

So what fashion lesson can teens teach us older folks?

"Experiment," Kelly says. "Don't get stuck in a fashion rut, and don't be afraid to look youthful. Society tells us that as we get older we have to dress a certain way, and that's just not true," she says. "There are weird, unwritten rules when it comes to age and fashion, and it doesn't have to be that way."

On Chelsea's campus after school one day, the image from years past of the typical gawky teen searching for an identity is nowhere to be found. With no two students dressed alike—some dressed up, some casual, some preppy, some funky—these kids seem more confident in their individuality.

"I completely changed my look this year," senior Greg Coello says in his sea-blue polo shirt and jeans. "I used to do the baggy-pant thing, you know, the rapper style, but now I look different and people don't know what to think."

"Yeah, man, you look good, you look real good this year," senior John Ruelas replies. "And that's all it really is about," he adds. "Feeling and looking good."

"I'm going to be a fashion icon someday, like P. Diddy," Ruelas announces to everyone. "Just watch." iB

NANETTE LEPORE

"Fun and flirty" describes both the clothes and their designer.

BY SAMANTHA HOUSE

Designer Nanette Lepore's use of color, embroidery and beading has turned more than a few heads in recent years. Her clothes are both provocative and fun, with bold hues and inventive fabrics. Hailing from Ohio, the daughter of a fashion maven/kindergarten teacher and an artist, Lepore has always been passionate about designing: She began making clothes at age 9 and pursued a self-education until she was accepted into the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York City. In 1996, not long after graduating, Lepore launched her own line, and it's been carried in premier department stores like Saks Fifth Avenue and Neiman Marcus for about eight years. This winter, Lepore opened a freestanding boutique in Boston—her fourth overall, with others in L.A., New York and Las Vegas.

Samantha House: When it comes to style, Boston has a reputation for conservatism. What's your impression of Boston style, and what do you hope to bring to it?

Nanette Lepore: I think Boston's style is great. I'm really impressed with the customers I've seen here. I don't really want my L.A. customers to hear this, but I think I have a cooler girl shopping here than in my other shops. When I walked in, I was like, "Wow." Everyone looks really pulled together and has a great style. I haven't noticed the conservatism at all.

SH: What made you choose Boston for your new store?

NL: My husband decides where we open the shops, and he sent me an e-mail saying, "We need a shop here. We need a shop here." And I think it was the right decision.

SH: Do you think Bostonians already know you?

NL: I think so. I think clients that are just discovering it may have seen the label without realizing how extensive the line is.

SH: You've been designing since you were very young. How have your designs changed through the years?

NL: [Laughs.] There's this famous photograph on the Web site where I took a crazy flowered blanket and dressed my neighbor in it. I probably just cut a hole in it and painted her face with flowers, and that was my first design. I put my name, Lepore, on a sign and made her hold it. And my dad took photographs of it. But I had a sewing machine at around 12, and I made my mom get me sewing lessons at the sewing center.

SH: What advice do you have for women who look into their closets and feel they have nothing to wear? How can they update their existing wardrobe to make it look new?

NL: I do get attached to certain things that I think make everything look great. Necklaces that I love, I switch off and on with two of them. And I have a favorite sweater that I've been layering over everything lately; I feel like it makes me look cool every time I wear it. I don't ever want to look overdressed, and I don't ever want to look conservative, so this great sweater achieves that. It's very bohemian—a little Indian with a low V-neck and embroidery.

SH: What things inspire your designs?

NL: Well, every year is different and new, and I feel like I can add products that I've wanted to over the years. For example, we've started to add more T-shirts and more clothes that aren't necessarily suit-like—just fun pieces. In the beginning you do what sells and what you can keep surviving on. Once the line got bigger, I had more freedom to allow pieces that aren't necessarily practical or sure things, and to expand the line in the direction I wanted to take it—to be more of an eclectic line.

SH: What's your favorite item in the spring line?

NL: Very high-waisted pants with a wide leg and high-waisted skirts. Very flattering—almost like a corset. I'm a little afraid, because when I started working on the spring line I was wearing shirts tucked in and a belt around my waist, and I hadn't done that for so long. I am worried that our customers may not be quite ready for it. With hip-huggers, everyone's waist size has gone up at least one size, so at least it will bring that back down.

SH: What's the one item that you can't live without?

NL: I love the poncho tops that we make every spring. They're embroidered.

SH: How would you accessorize a little black dress?

NL: Fishnet stockings and any kind of fabulous jewelry. Or you can just be simple and do great hair—like poofy hair. I like the idea of big, floppy hair.

SH: You have a lot of color in your line—in fact, you're known for it. Fall and winter brought us a lot in black. What are we going to see for spring in your store?

NL: The general trend is going to be a lot of beige and cream and white. But for me, I still have a lot of red and yellow and brown. Brown is new for us for spring, so we'll see how that goes.

SH: How did you feel when you first saw someone you didn't know wearing one of your pieces?

NL: It's still exciting when we go out to dinner and there's a sighting. And once in a while, someone will walk up and say, "That's Nanette Lepore," and I get embarrassed. But it's pretty funny. It's cute. IB

MOPSY

BY MOPSY STRANGE KENNEDY

IN A KLASS OF HER OWN

Physician Perri Klass of Cambridge writes short stories about work and family in Love and Modern Medicine.

It takes someone who plays both roles—as pediatrician/mother (not to mention writer) Perri Klass does—to convey the ironic overlappings between the supposed solidity of medicine and the quirks, anomalies and unpredictable pulls of parenthood. In one story, a competent doctor, solid and patient in medical emergencies, is a rather addled mother to her own rambunctious daughter. Furthermore, she has to balance truth with sugared optimism in answering her daughter's questions about sick young patients. Elsewhere, the friendship of old gal pals hits shaggy, slightly unequal footing; one's a scientist with creepy, harassing medical-coworker problems, the other's sleeping, dangerously, with her married landlord. Another story's about two stepsisters who've never been compatibly aligned, one's a pediatrician/mother and the other a mother who's lost her baby to sudden infant death. Klass portrays the itchy parallels and painful differences in their two lives, with the omnipresent undercurrent of being non-kindred step-spirits. There's also the story of a wonderfully wise, comically rough-hewn medical secretary (she's typed "OCD" enough to know she's got it) gets involved with a failing psychiatric trainee and manages to type his job recommendation, significantly altering the original downbeat, equivocal assessment up to "potentially pathbreaking therapist."

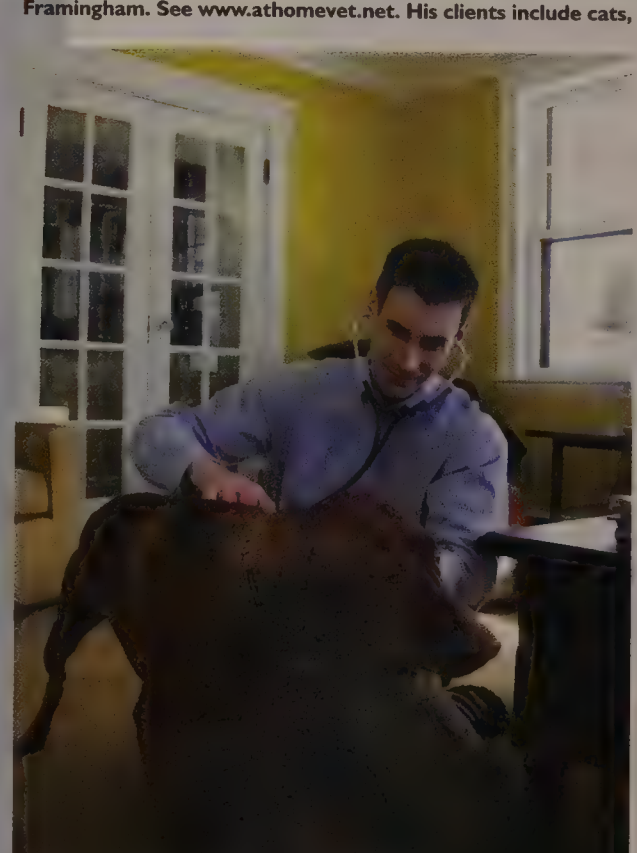
THAT WAS THEN, IT STILL IS NOW

Cheapo Records, downstairs at 645 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-354-4455), buys and sells records, CDs, tapes, movies on video etc.

In a world of increasingly isolated, click-addicted shoppers, real stores are precious—especially shaggy, friendly ones like Cheapo, where devoted customers have their questions answered by knowledgeable humans. Formerly the Cambridge Music Box, which opened in 1954, the record store changed hands and names to become Cheapo in 1975. Both of those bygone eras are represented in the arrayed vinyl LPs—old Top 40s mostly, some discs used, others still wrapped in plastic, preserving the artist's moment in virginal amber. Here, successive generations cherish the music of their adolescence: Aretha's soul is "back then" to some, the Coasters to others, and even dusty disco is someone's glittery treasure. One joy of LPs is the bigger cover, featuring artwork that captures that historical moment's audacity—from the Beatles' psychedelic swirls to the young Elton in a white suit and top hat at an estate, to sulky, soulful Sonny and Cher. Yellowed and fluttering against the wall are 45s in paper sleeves, thousands of titles you first peruse in a fat book. The store is chock-full of blues albums from the '30s through the '60s, many converted to CDs; energetic New Orleans LPs look especially poignant. Songs from the Depression, Yiddish music from Nazi-era Berlin and boxed sets of Dean Martin's complete oeuvre make for great, on-earth browsing.

HERE, VETTY VETTY!

Jeremy Gransky (617-753-9300 or 508-653-4300) does veterinary house calls in the Boston area and points west to Framingham. See www.athomevet.net. His clients include cats, dogs, birds, bunnies, reptiles and hamsters.



"I come with a ton of stuff," laughs Jeremy Gransky, referring to his house-call vet service, which has him—rather than your trembling dog, cat or even more fragile bird—commuting. Diagnostic equipment, scales, needles, medicine, laptop and printer troop in with him. Gransky's clients praise his bedside manner, his nurturance, patience and willingness to discuss matters of illness and choices. His services include checkups, immunizations, weighings and diagnostics. Blood tests are sent to local labs, then he calls you the next day with results. Should a hospital visit be necessary, he'll arrange it locally for you. One woman said, "He talks to my cats the way I do," adding that when she had to have him put her cat down, which he did very sympathetically, "I cried more than I've ever cried in anyone else's presence." And the comfort to animals—especially those who may be stressed or scared "litterboxless" by the journey to the vet's office—is enormous. Gransky gets down on the floor in an animal's comfortable spot; for one woman, he went under the bedclothes, found the sybaritically hiding kitty, and gave him the injection right there, purringly safe.

FIT FOR A KING?

Ruth's Chris Steak House lives up to its reputation for food, while lacking in service.

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY ERIC KULIN

T-bone steak

The magisterial building that once housed the elegant French restaurant Maison Robert in Old City Hall on School Street is no longer dark. After many months of rumor, build-up and planning, Ruth's Chris Steak House, a worldwide chain of over 90 restaurants, opened its doors in that space last October. From the time of its debut through my visits last month, crowds of people have streamed through its doors to get a peek at what has been done to this landmark and to sample one of Boston's newest exemplars of that quintessential American culinary phenomenon, the steakhouse.

A total makeover of its main floor has transformed Maison Robert's grande salle into one of the largest bars and cocktail lounges in Boston. Former rooms for private dinners have become the principal dining room, which accommodates about 60, and a smaller room, which seats fewer than 20. Ceilings of baronial dimensions remain, with massive wooden beams flanked by crenellated moldings from which are suspended huge marbleized glass light fixtures, with the lighting augmented by tiny spots affixed to the beams. Dark, formal draperies dress the high, well-proportioned windows. In the larger room, one wall is hung with a framed mirror, while framed paintings decorate the others. On the lower level, in the space that used to house Maison Robert's more informal bistro, Ben's Café, four dining rooms of varying sizes create a cozy ambience with handsome, exposed brick walls.

Ruth's Chris offers a selection of salads in large and small sizes. The steakhouse salad ($5.25 small; $8.25 large) contained a good mixture of crisp lettuces—iceberg, romaine and baby greens—along with red onions, cherry tomatoes and crunchy garlicky croutons. It served as a first-rate palate perker. In contrast, the small Caesar salad ($6.25) was pathetic. It arrived on a small sandwich plate, a single layer of finely chopped romaine lettuce, which, while it had decent texture, was so dry that the only flavor came from a liberal sprinkling of cheese and a handful of garlic croutons. Fortunately, aware of the restaurant chain's New Orleans roots, I chose a surefire starter in the Louisiana seafood gumbo ($8.95). This large bowl of moderately spicy soup, thickened with okra, filé and a scoop of white rice, showed good flavor and full body, and while it may not have rivaled the time-tested New Orleans gumbos of Galatoire's, Antoine's, and the Acme Oyster House, it reignited my nostalgia for the Big Easy. Not so with the barbecued shrimp ($12.95), a small ramekin of five modestly sized, lukewarm, shelled shrimp in a tepid, timidly spiced pink sauce. Only its high garlic content and the crunchy texture of the shrimp rescued the dish. Electing a "side" as a starter, I delighted in the asparagus with Hollandaise sauce ($9.25), seven or eight medium-thick spears cooked to a point of perfect texture, not hard, not soft, but pleasantly resilient.

In contrast with the uneven starters, the main events at Ruth's Chris—its steaks and chops—achieved consistent excellence. The chain's promotional materials, its menu and its service staff remind one that all steaks and chops are grilled at 1,800 degrees, and that the heavy porcelain dishes on which they are served retain their heat when brought to table and can cause severe burns. In this case, living with danger has its payoff, because the high-temperature grilling may be what renders Ruth's Chris' steaks and chops so deliciously succulent. For example, the veal chop ($29.95), which was over one-inch thick and served on the bone, emerged from its grilling with impeccably tender, juicy texture. To go along with that texture, an overnight marinade in garlic and olive oil produced a first-rate flavor, and a garnish of hot, sweet cherry peppers gave the dish an added dimension. Of the beef choices, we tried a filet mignon ($36.20) and a New York strip ($41.20). The filet, ordered medium-rare, brought rich, robust beef flavor, something not always evident in a cut that often sacrifices flavor for tenderness. The strip steak followed suit, slightly more resilient than the filet, but equally satisfying in flavor and texture, notwithstanding the fact that it had been ordered medium-well (th moment my son-in-law placed th order, I recalled the warning tha Durgin Park used to print on it menus: "We are not responsible fo steaks ordered well-done"). Again Ruth's Chris' high-temperatur grilling rendered this warning su perfluous by accomplishing the im possible: a medium–well done stea with juicy texture.

Three thick lamb chop ($37.95), their mild flavor evi dencing their domestic origins came seared on the outside with warm, pink center, luscious an tender. Finally, a double chicke breast ($20.95) profited from th same cooking technique, produc ing a beautiful piece of bird wit golden-brown skin, moist an juicy within. The fowl must hav been parcooked in some fashion since spending more than a fe moments in such a hot oven woul have burnt it to a crisp. However they di it, the kitchen achieved a marvelous result

As with other steakhouses, à la carte sid dishes figure prominently on the menu Priced between $8.25 and $9.25, they cam in ramekins large enough to serve two hun gry people. They ranged from a mediocr broccoli au gratin ($8.95), inundated wit pedestrian orange-colored cheese, to deli cious creamed spinach ($8.50), a steak house staple, and a spectacular sweet potat casserole ($8.50) topped with a pecan crust

As with the side dishes, the large sizes o the desserts ($10.95) made them suitable for sharing. The apple crumb tart and the bread pudding with whiskey sauce both came in the form of cylinders almost one-inch thick and six-inches across. The apple confection was rich, moist and quite sweet so it profited from the tartness of the Granny Smith apples and the small scoop of rich vanilla bean ice cream. The bread pudding long a New Orleans favorite, lived up to its heritage, with the whiskey sauce cutting the sweetness down to just the right amount.

Ruth's Chris' wine list poses a challenge for patrons who like to accompany their steak with a decent red wine without further inflating an already heavy tab. Prices start high and ascend quickly to the stratos-here. The lowest-priced red, a credible 000 Rioja Riserva from Campo Viejo $35), had good fruit and a decent structure, and but for its aggressive price did justice to the red meat.

In all, I visited Ruth's Chris three times: once in October at an opening for VIPs and press, once in early January by myself and once with a party of four two weeks later. The quality of the service and general ambience varied widely in those different visits. On the first, the new, enthusiastic waitstaff had been roused to a high level of performance, lavishing attention on all the diners, who ranged from Boston notables to the more modest members of the fourth estate. On my solo visit in early January, the greeting appeared stiff and formal, but the service in the dining room was knowledgeable, professional, efficient and appropriately attentive.

On my third visit, with my wife, daughter and son-in-law, the totality of the experience, despite good food, was disappointing. It started ominously when we arrived at the front door of the building one cold evening only to find it locked. My wife dug into her purse to find her cell phone and the restaurant's number to call for someone to unlock the door, while we and other would-be patrons waited outside. We laughed about that slip-up, obviously a freak accident, but it presaged an unsatisfying evening. A platoon of hosts and hostesses greeted us at the podium as they pored over books, computer screens and seating charts with an officiousness that must have rivaled the experience of my grandfather when he arrived at Ellis Island. The ambiance from our arrival to departure made us feel "processed," as if we were being ushered through our meal rather than treated as valued guests.

While water glasses were topped off frequently, our bread basket—we had dispatched the tiny loaf brought soon after we sat down—remained empty until we called it to the attention of our waiter. When my wife accidentally dropped her knife on the floor with a loud clang, the nearby waiter and bus person seemed oblivious. Even my Caesar salad went without the customary flourish of grindings from a peppermill. The leisurely approach to patrons made to wait in the entrance vestibule contrasted markedly with the pace of the meal after we sat down. Within what seemed like seconds of placing our orders, our first courses arrived, giving the impression that turning over tables is the name of the game at this restaurant. In fact, I'd been asked on my second, solo visit whether I'd be able to finish dinner in an hour and a half because the table was promised for 8 o'clock. That posed no problem, but the idea that the establishment's aggressive prices are accompanied by an aggressive timetable stuck in my craw. Similarly, my wife's mild observation to the host on the way out that there was an uncomfortable draft at our table (which she had mentioned to our waiter earlier) met with the somewhat brusque response, "No one has ever complained about it before."

At the same time, the steaks and chops at Ruth's Chris, and especially the sweet potato and pecan casserole, almost made it all worthwhile. If the first-rate steaks and chops and dismissive service could be leavened with a little Big Easy charm and Southern hospitality, this significant dining destination would be well served. iB

Serving up Success

On regulars, risk factors and raising the bar

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

It's what Tolstoy might have written if he'd been a food writer: All successful restaurants are alike; each unsuccessful restaurant fails in its own way. It's also an oversimplification, but insiders say there are requisites for filling and re-filling restaurant seats with happy diners, as well as specific factors that can stand in the way of success.

Recently closed Phatt Boys lasted less than a year in Harvard Square.

Al Stankus, Davio's wine manager for the past three years, attributes the Park Square eatery's huge popularity in part to the staff's ability to develop and cultivate a regular clientele. Regulars beget regulars." These days, says Stankus, diners with upscale tastes and E-Z open wallets are less likely to flit from one hot spot to the next, and prefer instead to patronize a "short list" of their favorites. "People like to be recognized," he says.

They also like to eat at the bar. On any given evening at Davio's, "well over half the people at the bar are eating," whether or not they're drinking. Over the past few years, Stankus has noted an increase in patrons ranging between 30 and 50 years old—Davio's target demographic—dining solo at the bar. It's crucial, he says, to have "a bar where you can sit around and talk," and the bar should be located at the front of the restaurant, to establish a welcoming first impression of friendliness and conviviality.

Conversely, "not having a full liquor license hurts" a restaurant's chances of success, says Stankus. Another risk factor, he adds, is a "subterranean location," which is intrinsically less welcoming, with less of a visible presence at the street level. Phatt Boys, which recently closed in Harvard Square, lasted less than a year in its basement location. (Will Thin Grrrls Grill move in?) And Perdix, chef/owner Tim Partridge's cozy South End bistro below sea level, has closed "for renovations" if you listen to the restaurant's answering machine message, or for good if you listen to well-informed industry sources.

Joe Quattrocchi, owner of Vox Populi, has learned what works and what doesn't since he opened Back Bay Brewing Company in the current Vox space on Boylston Street. "The restaurant business is an easy place to make money," he says. Contrary to popular belief, neither bad food nor bad service will make a restaurant unsuccessful, says Quattrocchi (and we can all think of plenty of examples), but the bottom line is the bottom line: If costs are higher than sales, top-notch service and exquisite cuisine won't keep you from going broke. What makes the difference, says Quattrocchi, is paying attention to detail.

Size matters, too. "I find it easier to run a bigger restaurant," says Davio's owner Steve DiFillippo. Besides the obvious advantage of economies of scale, DiFillippo says a large staff means he has the flexibility to easily adjust to circumstances such as sick waiters or fluctuations in kitchen staff. Davio's three function rooms provide a steady source of business, a key part of the bottom line, says DiFillippo. So his next restaurant, sizable at over 250 seats, will feature four function rooms. Called Avila, after his mother's Portuguese maiden name, the Mediterranean-themed eatery will be "upscale, with an open kitchen, a big bar and a small-plate selection," he says. Avila will open its doors just a block from Davio's, at One Charles. As for a time frame, "I'd be shocked if we didn't open in May," says DiFillippo. IB

CityScope: The Big "Dig In!"

Five years of successful Summer Restaurant Weeks weren't enough for Boston foodies. The first Winter Restaurant Week takes over more than 90 of the city's restaurants March 5-10 and features three-course, prix-fixe lunches and dinners. For $20.06 at lunch or $30.06 at dinner, you can try such local landmarks as Legal Sea Foods, the Oak Room, the Union Oyster House and Jasper White's Summer Shack. Every restaurant offers traditional favorites on the week's menus, while some on the list, including 33 Restaurant, UpStairs on the Square and Les Zygomates, have added new dishes to their menus just for the event. For a complete list of participating restaurants and the courses served at each, check out www.bostonusa.com/restaurantweek. Reservations are accepted at each venue. —LPK

Performing Arts: The Full Monty

What would we do without spam? On the bright side, there'd be no Hormel ham substitute and no e-mails trying to hook us up with a batch of black-market Viagra. But without spam, there'd also be no Spamalot, the Tony Award–winning Broadway musical running at the Colonial Theatre from March 7-April 15. Mike Nichols directs this adaptation of Monty Python and the Holy Grail, in which King Arthur and his knights errant embark on a low-budget quest for the Holy Grail and, in true Python fashion, encounter a slew of ridiculously comical situations along the way. With a cast including Frasier's David Hyde Pierce, Hank Azaria of The Simpsons and The Birdcage fame, plus a host of others, the Boston production kicks off the show's final national tour before it settles down for a 10-year stint at the Wynn Las Vegas Hotel and Casino. 106 Boylston St., Boston (617-426-9366). www.ticketmaster.com. March 7-April 15. Tue.-Thu., 7:30 pm; Fri., 8 pm; Sat., 2 and 8 pm; Sun., 2 and 7:30 pm. $37.50-$90. —RL

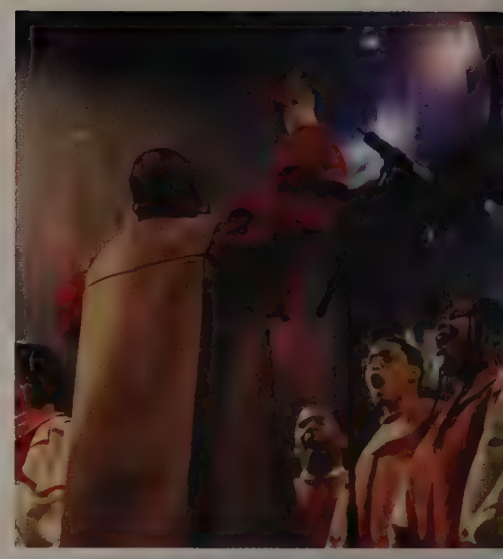
CityScope: A Very Phat Tuesday

This year's Mardi Gras celebrations have new depth, as revelers will celebrate the resilience and culture of New Orleans. But let's not forget the real reason we love Mardi Gras: the parties. The French Library and Cultural Center, along with the Cultural Services of the French Consulate have a throwdown planned for Fat [illegible]day. Taking place at Caprice Lounge, the French-inspired party will also feature Brazilian dancers and drummers, dance and lounge music by Caprice regular DJ Kamal, and a cash bar. The event is free, but there's a $15 suggested donation at the door to benefit public school systems in Louisiana. 275 Tremont St., Boston (617-912-0400). www.frenchlib. org. 9 pm. —LPK

WED./FEB. 22–TUE./FEB. 28

Music & Education: A Worthy Tribute



Black History Month ends on a high note in Boston this year with Berklee College of Music's Black History Month Music Celebration. The weeklong festival includes a performance Feb. 22 by vocalist Jessica Edmunds, who sings socially conscious songs with gospel, R&B, blues, jazz and hip-hop influences. Other events include a night with college gospel choirs from various Boston schools and Berklee's own Reverence Gospel Ensemble on Feb. 23; and visiting artist and Grammy Award–winning producer Rodney Jerkins, who leads a discussion the same day about his experience in the music business. Check the Web site for details on other events, like Jerome Kyles' Feb. 28 performance backed by a five-piece rhythm section and vocal ensemble. *The gospel choir performance at the Berklee Performance Center costs $5; all other events are free. FRI./MARCH 3

Comedy: Wild About Wanda

She's earned critical acclaim for roles on three mega-popular shows on HBO; she was the queen of prank phone calls on Comedy Central; she even scored her own FOX sitcom. And on March 3, comedian Wanda Sykes brings her stand-up act to Boston for a show at the Orpheum Theatre. Sykes got her big break in the comedy world in 1997, when she grabbed a gig as a writer/performer on the Chris Rock Show. She stayed with Rock until 2000, and later earned spots on two more HBO hits. First came the 2001 debut of her recurring character Wanda, one of Cheryl David's friends, on Curb Your Enthusiasm; then in 2002 she served as a correspondent for Inside the NFL, winning an Emmy in the process. After her legendary appearances as the vulgar Gladys Murphy on Comedy Central's Crank Yankers, Sykes moved on to FOX in 2003, where her sitcom Wanda At Large lasted two full seasons, which by FOX standards is damn near an eternity. With all that under her [illegible]ub, and (pun intended) we're pretty Syked. 1 Hamilton Place, Boston (617-931-2000). www.ticketmaster.com. March 3, 7:30 pm. $35. —RL

Brokeback Mountain ★★★
Ang Lee's "gay cowboy movie" turns out to be more emotional and less sensational than you might expect. It's a 20-plus-year tale of two young cowboys (Heath Ledger, Jake Gyllenhaal) put together on a summer ranching job in 1963, who fall for each other despite saying they're "not queer." As each returns to his separate life, eventually involving an unsatisfying marriage for each man, they reconnect in a secret relationship during "fishing trips" on the mountain where they once herded sheep. Whenever the opportunity arises to live together and start a ranch over the next 20 years, one's fear of being found out thwarts the relationship from going further. The end result is a sad tale of frustration, self-censorship and a life together that never was, intimately told, with no villains beyond those unseen societal forces inhibiting the two men. Ledger's performance as the close-mouthed cowpoke we see most can be mannered, but the earthy restraint of the movie—in its staging and its tight focus on its characters—adds to its effectively melancholy mood. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square, Coolidge Corner and suburbs.)

Firewall ★★
Harrison Ford is notoriously afraid of deviating from the formula that's made him successful. The result here is a play-it-safe movie that's painfully mediocre. Ford's latest doesn't just reconstitute elements of his previous films—Frantic, Patriot Games, The Fugitive and Air Force One—with Ford as another decent guy in a pinch who takes life-threatening risks to get out of it. This story of a bank security expert who's forced to aid in a robbery by a gang that kidnaps his family also recalls Ransom (both versions), Hostage, The Desperate Hours (both versions) and, on the small screen, the first season of 24. With his perpetually puzzled facial expressions, Ford doesn't exactly convince you he's Mr. Software Wizard, the brains behind a Seattle bank's computer security system, while Paul Bettany does little that's memorable as the mastermind orchestrating the heist. The ultimate insult is that director Richard Loncraine already made a movie in his native England in the 1980s with the same premise (Bellman & True), and it's as taut as this is flaccid. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Good Night, and Good Luck ★★★½
There's passion dripping from George Clooney's 1950s tale—for journalism, for liberty, for moviemaking. Filmed in an evocative, cigarette-smoke-filled black-and-white, his second movie as director chronicles the decision by CBS TV's no-nonsense star journalist, Edward R. Murrow (David Strathairn), to take on Sen. Joseph McCarthy, the Communist-hunting bully. Murrow's on-air bravery helps turn the tide against McCarthy, and beneath the tense story of dilemmas and decisions—told in a vibrant style in which the camera often seems to find" the action, documentary-style—are the issues of the role of journalism and the larger matter of what it means to be an American. Clooney sets the one for the movie by not taking the lead role. Instead, he plays Murrow's producer, Fred Friendly. Similarly, the movie doesn't grandstand or go for big moments," and Strathairn not only catches Murrow's distinctively clipped cadence, he also lets that cadence suggest the moral precision that defines the character, as well as the movie. (At Kendall Square and Embassy Waltham.)

King Kong ★★★
Peter Jackson's remake will never replace the inventive original, but it clearly has more to offer than the 1976 remake. Retaining the early-1930s setting, Jackson turns Merian C. Cooper's original into an often thrilling, sometimes bloated succession of set pieces, as a showman full of ideas (Jack Black) takes stars (Naomi Watts, Kyle Chandler), a screenwriter (Adrien Brody) and a crew to find "undiscovered" Skull Island and film an adventure movie. Not only do they find the island and its natives, they also find the supersized title character (rendered in impressively expressive CGI), who takes a shine to the actress. Some of the best sequences replicate the original—including Kong's battle with a T. Rex (three of them, in this case) and the scene in which he shakes humans off a tree-trunk bridge to their deaths. Jackson also adds great-squirming action with monstrous creepy-crawlies and huge worms. The story pushes the romance between Watts' actress and Brody's writer too hard, and the climactic, top-of-the–Empire State Building sequence drags on, but the production design and visual effects in the New York scenes are dazzling and, as in Cooper's version, Black's character becomes a surrogate for the filmmaker, with Jackson poking fun at this gallsy but insincere showman. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Comic States

CSA skewers history, racism and the media.

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Kevin Willmott's CSA: Confederate States of America, an instant classic of the mockumentary genre, is like a cross between Airplane! and Bamboozled. It's political commentary in a big, put-this-in-your-pipe-and-smoke-it way, but Willmott has so much fun making us laugh that he takes swipes at anything and everything his movie can grab a hold of, usually successfully. CSA just rolls along on its considerable comic momentum.

CSA is, most of all, speculative history that uses its imagination to make comments about our reality. Writer-director Willmott's movie playfully answers several questions: What if the South had won the Civil War? How would that have changed the course of history? How would that have sustained ways of thinking that, in our society, eventually fell out of fashion?

CSA delivers its provocative brand of satire right from the start. It frames itself as an English-made documentary that's being shown on an American TV station, commercials and all. Before the purported British documentary even begins, we get an eerily convincing commercial for an insurance company that just happens to be called Confederate Family Insurance, featuring a nice white family that—oh, look!—has a black servant working on their lawn.

Familiar historical events get a twist in the mockumentary Confederate States of America

How could an insurance company have such a name and promote such a racial caste system in this day and age? Simple, once you see the history in CSA: the Confederacy framing the "War of Northern Aggression" as a battle for "freedom of private property" and convincing France and England to enter the fight on its side; the defeat of the Union forces at Gettysburg; Lincoln trying to flee the country in blackface on the Underground Railroad and being convicted of war crimes and exiled to Canada.

But CSA goes far beyond the Civil War, and right up to the present. There's also such history as the Reconstruction in which President Jefferson Davis and the CSA absorbed the United States and brought slavery back to the north through tax incentives; the conquest of the Wild West, enslavement of Chinese railroad workers and banishment of Jews, save those allowed to stay on a reservation in Long Island; the CSA's imperialist swallowing of Central and South Americas; our non-aggression pact with Hitler's Nazi Germany and our Dec. 7, 1941, sneak attack on Japan; not to mention the 1950s witch hunt to root out abolitionists, leading the CSA to erect the "Cotton Curtain" on the Canadian border.

It's a flurry of targeted comedy worthy of The Daily Show or The Colbert Report. But CSA never lets its messages get in the way of its laughs. In fact, the satiric means through which Willmott, a Kansas University film professor, conveys his message is essential. Just as with that opening insurance-company commercial, there's a cause-and-effect that keeps ricocheting around between the "documentary" and the products and attitudes in the commercial breaks. CSA isn't just satire because of the way it spoofs Ken Burns' The Civil War, with its readings of letters, folksy music and avuncular Southern historian (played by Rupert Pate). Instead, it's a freeform deluge of media parodies, with excerpts of faux military, industrial and 1950s classroom films ("Golly, Mr. Johnson, America was always a slave-based economy!"), a Birth of a Nation spoof (a clip of a D.W. Griffith film depicting the capture of Lincoln), clips from the Slave Shopping Network and a promo for a Martha Stewart–like show in which the hostess promises to cover "what to look for when buying your next Chinese gardener" on her next episode. Each of the spoofs is utterly convincing and totally deadpan.

While CSA might sound outrageous, and it's easily the funniest comedy to come out in months, it really does make you rethink common assumptions about our society. Willmott achieves this in a few ways. First off, he twists real events in our history, like sending a people to reservations or the existence of a 1950s witch hunt. He also exaggerates things we already do—like repeatedly pursue wars against nonwhites—in order to make us question the reality he's tweaked. His fake commercials regularly tout such products and businesses as Coon Chicken Inn, an actual restaurant chain decades ago, and it makes you realize that a lot of what we consider racist was acceptable not very long ago, and the remnants of such thought can still be found among us. (A postscript at the end of the movie reveals that more of the spoof products are real than you might have guessed.)

CSA has a "presented by" Spike Lee credit, but that's ironic, since this no-budget, no-name movie blows away Lee's Bamboozled, which comically confronted many of the same issues but petered out in its second half. Like most of the best comedies, CSA takes no prisoners. iB

CSA: Confederate States of America
★★★½
Written and directed by Kevin Willmott. With Evamarii Johnson, Rupert Pate and Larry J. Peterson. Not Rated. At the Coolidge Corner Theater.

In Lars Von Trier's Manderlay, Willem Dafoe and Bryce Dallas Howard take over the roles played by James Caan and Nicole Kidman in the director's Dogville.

Manderlay ★★½

Lars Von Trier's follow-up to Dogville finds a change in cast—with Nicole Kidman saying "no más" and Bryce Dallas Howard taking over as the heroine—but no change in approach. The second segment in his trilogy set in 1930s America has the same sort of minimalist sets, ensemble cast, backwater setting and wholly unsubtle look at man's inhumanity to man. In this episode, 40 minutes shorter than the three-hour first, Grace (Howard, whose youth provides a helpful naiveté) comes upon an Alabama plantation where slavery still exists, 70 years after the Emancipation Proclamation. She decides to stick around, to see that the slaves are freed and that these uneducated people unfamiliar with freedom and the outside world can adjust to life on the plantation as partners, not slaves. Not surprisingly, she's sometimes patronizing, and what she thinks is best for the ex-slaves isn't always what they want for themselves. You often feel Von Trier's goal here is to make everybody look bad, and he's asking a lot for people to invest in a heroine for whom he shows such contempt. Yet, as in Dogville, the unconventional staging and provocative intricacies of the story are interesting. Is this all an allegory about our botched "liberation" of Iraq? Part of me wants to dismiss this trilogy for its simplistic misanthropy. But I can't. (At Kendall Square.)

The Matador ★★★

Writer-director Richard Shepard's blend of rowdy comedy, middle-aged blues riff and gripping thriller is an amiable shaggy dog. Shepard has been making low-budget, barely released movies for over a decade, some bad (The Linguini Incident) and some good (Oxygen, with Adrien Brody and Maura Tierney). He's stepping up in class here, and he gets fine performances from Pierce Brosnan and Greg Kinnear, who play, respectively, a dashing but burned-out hitman and a decent Denver businessman desperately trying to stop an indecent losing streak in life. The two meet in a Mexico City hotel bar and become uneasy buddies, and the actors let us see the vulnerable people behind their characters' surfaces. The movie's funny/ dangerous mix of crime and comedy places it firmly in Elmore Leonard territory, and though it lacks the personality and laugh count of the best Leonard adaptations (Out of Sight and Get Shorty), it holds its own better than most Leonard imitations. (At Boston Common.)

Match Point ★★½

After making predominantly unfunny comedies for the last decade, Woody Allen has shown a little smarts by making his first drama since 1989's Crimes and Misdemeanors, with which this ultimately bears some similarity. It also shakes up Allen's predictable routine by being set in London and not having a character who's just an Allen surrogate. The protagonist this time is a tennis instructor (Jonathan Rhys Meyers) who falls in with a wealthy family, ultimately marrying into it and becoming a well-paid cog in the family business. But his affair with an American actress (Scarlett Johansson) that he loves more than his wife (Emily Mortimer) threatens his cushy new lifestyle, and he's forced to choose between love and comfort. It's well-acted and generally involving—and punctuated by opera arias that I'm sure have more relevance to those who know what's being played out in them (alas, I'm not one of those people). The trouble is that the wheels turn very slowly in the drama, and Allen, whose comedies are at least short and snappy, drags this out to an unnecessary 125 minutes that actually seem longer. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square and suburbs.)

Munich ★★★

In Saving Private Ryan, Steven Spielberg opened with a horrific battle sequence, then spent the rest of the movie trying to convince you the ideals of World War II justified all that carnage. His latest takes a more somber approach to the effects of violence, especially on those who inflict it. Eric Bana stars as an Israeli soldier who, following the kidnapping and murder of the Israeli Olympic team at the 1972 summer games in Munich, is recruited to head a covert squad assigned to find and assassinate the Palestinians who planned the Olympic Village attack. The early action feels odd, as it has you rooting for the team (also including characters played by Daniel Craig and Ciaran Hinds) to kill people, especially since Spielberg withholds most of the Olympic violence until later flashbacks. Still, the movie functions as a well-oiled, globetrotting thriller full of nail-biting sequences, and the movie's sense of right and wrong, good and bad, isn't as fixed as it initially seems. As the squad leader gets deeper into the shadow world in which any ally might be an enemy, and in which helpful friends might have hidden agendas that aren't very friendly, he begins to question the value of fighting violence with violence. Does his violence just create more enemies? Does it really make him safer from attack? Whether this is meant as a commentary on the current "war on terror" is debatable, but it's certainly food for thought. Aside from one very dubious piece of editing—in which Spielberg intercuts the final flashback of Olympic tragedy with a sex scene—this is solid, thoughtful stuff from Spielberg, a step up from last summer's War of the Worlds. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The New World ★★

There's effective cinematic storytelling, and there's ineffective cinematic storytelling. A love story in which the two lovers talk ceaselessly in voice-overs, but very little in dialogue to each other—as happens in Terrence Malick's latest—falls with a splat into the ineffective category. Like Malick's The Thin Red Line, this early-17th-century tale of the settlement of Jamestown has such a languorous pace that the action never quite gets involving. It's semi-interesting to have a more adult telling of the same story Disney polished up in Pocahontas, between Captain John Smith (Colin Farrell) and his teen native love, Pocahontas (Q'orianka Kilcher), but because of the movie's (and the lovers') communication gap, Malick never gets across what bonds the two lead characters besides their hot bods. So instead of a dreamy, passionate tale of European and Native American cultures colliding, this often seems more like a really long, slow Abercrombie & Fitch ad, and I'm not buying. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Syriana ★★★

Traffic writer Stephen Gaghan makes his debut as writer-director in this drama that essentially takes the same approach to the oil business as the earlier movie did to the drug trade—by looking at the intersection of business, politics and crime. There's a wide variety of characters and locations here, and through much of the first hour you pine for a scorecard to keep everyone and everything straight in your head: There's a CIA field agent (George Clooney) popping back and forth between Washington and the Middle East, a Saudi-like emirate full of palace intrigue, two Texas oil companies trying to merge, a D.C. lawyer (Jeffrey Wright) the oil companies hire to fend off the Department of Justice, an expatriate American energy analyst (Matt Damon) who becomes an adviser to the more progressive prince of the emirate (Alexander Siddig), and a Pakistani immigrant (Mazhar Munir) who loses his oil-refinery job in the Persian Gulf because of all the boardroom machinations. Despite the sheer complexity of the early going, the story comes together very potently in its second half, with a particularly chilling climax. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Three Burials of Melquiades Estrada ★★½

There's a lot to like in Tommy Lee Jones' directorial debut. He's made a western; he's collaborated with writer Guillermo Arriaga (Amores Perros), who creates another time-shifting ensemble story; he shows a Sam Peckinpah–like affection for the lonely spaces of the border area between Texas and Mexico, where this story of the murder of the title character, a Mexican cowboy (Julio Cedillo), takes place; and his cast includes lived-in performances by Melissa Leo, Dwight Yoakam, Barry Pepper, Levon Helm and Jones himself, among others. But in other ways Arriaga's script falls short. Character development is especially skimpy for Estrada, who remains a symbol instead of a character, and Pete (Jones), his Texan buddy who decides to do something about the murder because the local sheriff (Yoakam) won't. Pete's journey, which involves dragging the young border patrolman (Pepper) who shot Estrada into Mexico to bury the body and face the dead man's family, has its dramatic moments, like Helm's appearance as a suicidal blind man. But it also aspires to be an absurd journey that takes on irrational meaning for Pete, along the lines of Peckinpah's Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia. It comes nowhere near its inspiration on that level, so the results here are mixed. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Transamerica ★★

It's great to see Felicity Huffman of TV's late, great Sports Night (and now Desperate Housewives) take center stage in a movie, playing the pre-op male transsexual hero(ine) in this road movie. But, despite her convincing performance as a highly-strung, deeply sad man preparing for an imminent sex change, it's clear early on that first-time writer-director Duncan Tucker is going to keep the tale on a merely pleasant, surprisingly bland keel (it's even blander when weighed against the similarly gender-bending Breakfast on Pluto). Huffman's Stanley "Bree" Osbourne discovers he has a teenage son, and his shrink (Elizabeth Pena) requires him to meet the offspring (Kevin Zegers) before she'll sign off on the sex change. But all Tucker can concoct for these two is predictable tension as the strangers road-trip from New York to Los Angeles before their inevitable bonding, and sitcom-style hysterics when, after car trouble, the pair reluctantly stop at the house of Bree's estranged parents in Phoenix. Most of all, Tucker's movie seems like a pale version of The Station Agent, which was a more vivid, amusing and heartfelt peek at outsider characters. (At Kendall Square.)

Tristram Shandy: A Cock and Bull Story ★★★

It's an adaptation of a famous book that few have read, but in Michael Winterbottom's postmodern treatment, you may need to know more about t career of star Steve Coogan than about Lauren Sterne's 18th-century novel. Coogan, star of Hour Party People, Around the World in 80 Days a TV's Alan Partridge series, stars as both the t character and as "Steve Coogan," the insecure ac starring in the movie. The action flits betwe Sterne's story and a behind-the-scenes looks at t making of the movie, with the latter being the m memorable, especially the scenes between Coog and Rob Brydon, the co-star he fears might ov shadow him. Coogan and Brydon, who it turns have done lots of English TV comedy togeth make a great team, though you sometimes get t impression they'd be just as funny improvising they are in Winterbottom's elaborate scenario. T movie's good for many playful chuckles, thoug doubt if that is all the writer-director is after. Kendall Square.)

Walk the Line ★★★

Writer-director James Mangold's Johnny Cash bio isn't Ray Lite, it's Ray White: rural Southern upbrir ing, childhood tragedy, musical talent, drugs a-plen 1960s meltdown, triumphant comeback on the w to icon status. As Jamie Foxx did in Ray, Joaqu Phoenix gives a strong, galvanizing performance Cash, in a story that takes him from farmland to F som Prison concert and marriage to the woman long pursued, June Carter (Reese Witherspoon). that pursuit that drags out the movie, though. Car initially repels Cash's advances because they're bo married when they first meet, then because he comes a drugged-up wreck from not being with her. addition to Cash's desire to please his forever-unir pressed dad (Robert Patrick)—who sees Johnny as ferior to his brother, who died as a kid—this thwart affair is about the only motivation we're given for hero. Phoenix gives Cash an earthy charm and Wit erspoon makes Carter a smart spitfire. And they bo gain points for doing their own vocals. But after while, you want to say, "We get it! He wants to sha up with her!" Despite Cash's fiery comeback with t Folsom Prison concert (and its hit live album), t last third drags because of the monotony of the pu suit, taking some pep out of an otherwise evocati tribute to a musical legend. (At Boston Commo Fenway and suburbs.)

Why We Fight ★★½

There's nothing wrong with Eugene Jarecki's doc mentary examining the war in Iraq as a cons quence of the proliferation of the influence-wiel ing military-industrial complex. He takes movie's title from the series of WWII propagan films Frank Capra produced for the governmer and he makes great use of Dwight Eisenhower's mous 1961 farewell speech in which the outgoi president and ex-general warned of the dangers militarism run amuck. Still, most of Jarecki's mov covers the same ground as previous Iraq-critiqui documentaries such as Hijacking Catastrophe a Uncovered, with which it shares such central inte view subjects as Lt. Col. Karen Kwiatowski, w quit the service in disgust over the current war, a ex-CIA agent Chalmers Johnson. If you haver seen those movies (or aren't a regular viewer of T Daily Show), Jarecki's documentary won't seem redundant. But this movie might have served a be ter purpose if it had looked further at the larg pattern of behavior by American governmen leading up to Iraq. That's the real story here. Kendall Square.)

Pursuit of Happiness

Belle and Sebastian sheds its enigma and energizes the soul.

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

The Scottish indie-pop group Belle and Sebastian boasts a cult-like fan base devoted to leader Stuart Murdoch's delicate vocals, detail-rich romanticism and pastoral melodies. But the soulful, punchy grooves of The Life Pursuit confirm that there's a new attitude in place to charm the masses.

"You'd be a liar if you said that you didn't want something to happen," Murdoch says. "There's always ambition, but for accessibility, you never know until you see the monthly figures. We're just trying to make a good pop record."

"We've always been driven," the singer adds from a U.K. concert stop before Belle and Sebastian opens an American tour at Avalon Feb. 27 and 28. "We're no shrinking violets, you know. You don't make two [long-playing] records in the first year of getting together without being driven."

Yet when Belle and Sebastian (named after a French novel about a boy and his dog) released the 1996 albums Tigermilk and If You're Feeling Sinister only months apart, it marked an achievement of a different kind for Murdoch. A few years earlier, he could barely get out of bed—much less lead a band—due to chronic fatigue syndrome, an illness that causes severe exhaustion and makes concentration difficult.

"I know chronic fatigue syndrome might sound like getting over a cold, but I was disabled for seven years," says Murdoch, 37, who dropped out of Glasgow University and moved back into his parents' house. "Working, sports and music, everything I loved, even living in the city—I had to give it all up and start from scratch. It's an amazing turnaround when you're 19 years old to do that. You drop your friends and everything and become a different person."

That person began to write songs. "That's when I started [to play] the piano and started hearing music," he says. "The inspiration was just to avoid being depressed. Because I wasn't doing anything, I used to fantasize all the time, and what I fantasized about became the songs. I used to fantasize about having any sort of job whatsoever, be it a busman or a train driver. Because I could be that [character], I could write little adventures about it."

Murdoch also gained strength through his Christian faith. He began attending church, at one point working there as a live-in janitor, and he still sings with the choir when not on the road. "Spirituality is life," he says. "It's in everything I think about and do. So to me, if it wasn't for spirituality, I probably wouldn't write."

He eventually felt compelled to go public with his songs, and recruited the other band members to fill a requirement for a music business course. "If the band had come along any sooner, perhaps I wouldn't have been able to handle it," he says. "But it came along at the right time."

Critics and fans, in turn, heaped immediate adulation on Belle and Sebastian's debut releases. "I wasn't daunted whatsoever," Murdoch says. "It was really nice."

The group built a chatty rapport with fans through Internet exchanges, some of which were transcribed for the liner notes to The Life Pursuit. But until recently, Murdoch and his Belle and Sebastian mates were less forthcoming with the media, shunning band photos and interviews.

"It just didn't seem to be worth it at the time," says Murdoch, who found their early English press particularly frustrating. "It's when you're young, before you know how to handle it, when you realize that they're just going to take what you said and chop it up and turn it around."

Ironically, Belle and Sebastian finally warmed to the press after an internal soap opera led to the departure of both cellist-singer Isobel Campbell (with whom Murdoch had been romantically involved) and co-founding bassist Stuart David.

"No disrespect, but it was just the right time," Murdoch says of losing David in 2000 and Campbell two years later. "It marked the halfway point in the life of the group. Everything that went before was the Glasgow days of being a collective and trying to keep the dream alive. Then the second half was everyone feeling much more comfortable, relieved and happy about getting out there and playing."

Belle and Sebastian's American tour kicks off here in Boston

That liberation infuses the new CD, which weaves echoes of Murdoch's onetime heroes the Smiths, the Kinks, T. Rex, David Bowie, the Isley Brothers and—and in the opening to "White Collar Boy"—the 1970 hit "Spirit in the Sky."

"There are seven people here who have been immersed in—and loving—popular music all their lives," Murdoch says of the group, which is augmented on tour by a string quintet. "There's no need to try and make a record a certain way. It's in our veins when we get together." iB

MAKSOU
HAIR & MAKE UP ARTISAN ✦ DAY SPA

When you come to MAKSOU you are in for more than just a dry-cut – not only will we cut your hair, we will shape it and teach you how to style it. Our dry-cutting technique is based on achieving a young, simple finish. Hair should not have scissor lines – it should look like it has never been cut before and blend seamlessly. Whether your hair is fine, thick, straight or curly, we will give it a natural shape and soft neck line by cutting one strand or curl at a time. The trend this season according to MAKSOU is wavy hair. We can give you the shape and tools to create fabulous waves, or we can simply create the look that brings out the best in you and your personal style. Please inquire about our MAKSOU Makeover package, which includes our signature dry-cut, expert hair color, and a makeup application and lesson to enhance your features with the season's hottest colors – all at a special introductory price for first time clients!

It's Personal

David Hockney's intimate portraits come to the MFA.

Think of David Hockney and a sparkling but deserted Hollywood swimming pool comes to mind. David Hockney Portraits, opening Feb. 26 at the Museum of Fine Arts, puts the people in the picture. Subjects are friends, family, lovers—and the artist himself.

"Hockney is a very, very warm human being. Close personal relationships, friendships mean a lot to him, and just like a poet who expresses it in poems, he expresses it through his brush, his pencil and his pen," says MFA Director Malcolm Rogers.

David Hockney's "My Parents" displays at the MFA exhibition

Hockney, a native of Britain living in California, dove deep into portraiture in every period of his career and in every medium from pencil to Polaroid. The 163 works here include iconic paintings such as the glitzy "Peter Getting Out of Nick's Pool" and the moody couple with their cat in "Mr. and Mrs. Clark and Percy." But the simplest works can be just as powerful.

"I was looking yesterday at the drawing he did of W.H. Auden, the poet, who had a very famous wrinkled face," Rogers says. "And the way Hockney captures the texture of his skin with an absolute minimum of line! And then you can almost smell the man. He was a heavy, heavy smoker, and there's just a suggestion of a cigarette and smoke in the air."

Given controversy over recent "crowd-pleaser" exhibitions, the Hockney seems like a double win for the MFA: serious and significant, but also likely a major draw.

Hockney, Rogers says, is "very approachable as an artist, and... his works say, in very clear form, 'Human beings, relationships, feelings—they really matter to me.' And I think that's just a beautiful story to be telling."

David Hockney Portraits runs at the MFA, Feb. 26-May 14. 465 Huntington Ave., Boston (866-319-4658). www.mfa.org. Advance tickets recommended. $22, adults; free to museum members. MBTA: E Green Line to Museum. The exhibition will travel to the Los Angeles County Museum of Art and then to the National Portrait Gallery in London. —Joel Brown
